MISCELLANEOUS.

CLOTH MAKING.

To make good Cloth, farmers should be more attentive to their Sheep, and not sell the best & finest lambs. Sheep should never be yarded with cattle; they should be kept in good flesh, that the wool may be lively, and fed in a rack so constructed that the seed and chaff cannot fall from the hay into the wool, for these essentially injure it, and makes it very troublesome to the manufacturer. The season is now at hand when the Sheep should be freed from their warm coats—a few days before the Sheep are washed, all the tag-locks adhering to their tail and breech, should be carefully cut off, so that the fleece may wash the cleaner on the Sheep's back; they should then be taken into a stream of running water and there well and carefully washed—they must then be turned on a clean grassy field for at least three or four days in order that the wool may dry, and the animal oil penetrate its pores again; this oil keeps the wool alive and preserves its pliability. Suitable attention has not been paid to the sorting of wool; the fleece should be divided into three or four sorts from fine to coarse, if this is not attended to, the cloth is very apt to pucker in fulling—all coarse and dead ends of the wool should be cut off, if they are spun and wove into cloth, they will make it spotted, as the coarse & dead will not take the colour equal to the good wool.—The wool must be well carded and the spinning of the yarn confined to one person who will spin an even thread and give an equal twist, or the warp might be spun by one person and the filling by another; different spinners make different kinds of yarn, which will make Cloth work badly, it should be spun to an even good thread, the filling something coarser than the chain, and much slacker twisted; hard twisted filling makes the Cloth pucker in fulling; there should be one third, or at least one fourth more filling than chain by weight; the weaver should so suit the chain as to admit all the filling, and weave it as close and even as possible; uneven weaving makes the Cloth pucker in fulling; in order to weave the Cloth close enough, the filling should be wove in wet, or at least moist, for dry filling wove into a hard sized chain can never make good Cloth, particularly if the filling be hard twisted; carefully keep it clean from cotton and linneth threads and lint; make as few knots as possible and trim as you weave; if all the knots are not carefully cut off before the Cloth is filled, they are afterwards liable to be cut off in shearing the Cloth, which is apt to make small holes in and injure it. The weaving of woollen Cloth is generally performed too carelessly and indifferently, and if the Cloth does not meet the expectation of the owner, the fault is generally attributed to the Clothier; when Cloth is made in conformity to these directions, there is no danger of its working badly in the mill, but if a number of hands be employed in spinning a piece, and especially if the filling be hard twisted you may expect the Cloth will pucker in the mill, and such can never be dressed to appear even tolerably decent; some people who proceed in this manner, complain of the fuller, because their Cloth does not look so others that had no better wool, but they may rely on it, that the fault lies in the spinning and weaving. People would do well to make their Cloth earlier in the season than usual, it is better to full and dress Cloth in the warm weather than in cold.

From the Boston Spectator.

GENERAL LEE.

The eccentric John Neal, in an article in the Edinburgh Magazine has asserted the pre-eminent claims of Gen. Charles Lee to the gratitude of Americans, and accused Washington of sacrificing him to his own ambition in the transactions following the affair of Monmouth. This is no new strain—one English writer has gone further, attributing the whole success of our conflict to his example and courage, and all the aid granted by France to his eloquent representations, and personal influence, with its sovereign. The charge against the fair fame of Washington is entirely unsupported by evidence, and contradicted by every virtue which adorned his character. The charge against us as Americans is equally groundless—no man ever received rewards and honours more liberal, till acts of imprudence or treachery forfeited his title to them. And the deep and loudly uttered invectives in which the latter part of his life was spent in hurling forth against our country, and our country's best friends, are not soon to be forgotten or forgiven by those who then and since have read them.

But we would not deny to this singular character the praise of powers, above the common rank of minds. We have lately perused a volume, published a few days since in England, claiming for him the authorship of the celebrated "Letters of Junius." The fact, if proved, would, under the circumstances in which he was placed, do no credit to his honesty of principle, how much soever it might honour his literary fame. But this would be only in exact conformity to the known history of his conduct and temper, which were alike changeable and violent. The circumstances alleged in proof of his share in their composition, are to us new and forcible; though after the evidence in support of Sir Phillip Francis' claims we cannot form a decided opinion, nor have we seen them examined by any impartial judge.

The first fact is undoubted, that not long before his death, in conversation with Mr. Rodney, (the father of Cesar A. Rodney,) he made some remarks, apparently undesignedly, implying that he was Junius; and when questioned directly by Mr. Rodney, admitted that he was—but requested that it might be kept secret while he lived.

The second is as strong—that in a private letter of Junius to Mr. Woodfall, alluding to one of his published pieces attacking the Duke of Grafton, he called it "my Leo to the Duke of Grafton"—apparently a substitution, in the haste of writing of the real for the assumed name. The third circumstance is of a singular character. When Gen. Lee was first mentioned as the author of Junius, two of Lee's intimate friends produced two letters dated Poland, to prove his absence from England during the time of publication. By that evidence, the question was thought to be settled. But Mr. Goldsborough, who has examined the subject, has found letters to Leo in England from persons in Poland bearing the same date with these pretended letters—seemingly to prove that these letters, though with the express design on the part of Lee to enable his friends to disprove the charge of his composition of Junius, there are other circumstances which we will not repeat. We have been unwittingly led thus to extend this article; that we might hereby furnish some curious minds to enquire further into this mystery, or communicate to us the result of the inquiries of others better acquainted with the whole history.
