[From the Port Folio.]
THE THREE HUNCHBACKS.

At a short distance from Doual. there stood a castle on the bank of a river, near a bridge. The master of the castle was hunchbacked, Nature had exhausted her ingenuity in the formation of his whimsical figure. In place of understanding. she had given him an immense head, which nevertheless was lost between his two shoulders; he had thick hair, a short neck and a horrible visage.

Spite of his deformity, this bugbear bethought him of falling in love with a beautiful young woman, the daughter of a poor but respectable burgess of Doual. He sought her in marriage, and as he was the richest person in the district, the poor girl was delivered up to him. After the nuptials he was as much an object of pity as she, for, being devoured by jealousy, he had no tranquilfty night nor day, but went prying and rambling every where, and suffered no stranger to enter the cas-

One day during the Christmas festival, while standing sentinel at his gate he was accosted by three humphacked minstrels. They saluted him as a brother, as such asked him for refreshments and at the same time, to establish the fraternity, they ostentatiously shouldered their hump at him. Contrary to expectation, he conducted them to his kitchen, gave them a capon with peas, and to each a piece of money iver and above. Before their departure however, he warned them never to return on pain of being thrown into the river. At this threat of the Chatelain the minstrels laughed heartily, and took the road to the townsinging in full, chorus, and dancing in a grotesque manner in de-rision of their brother hump of the castle. He on his part, without paying farther attention, went to walk in the fields. The lady, who saw her husband cross the bridge, and had heard the minstrels, called them back to amuse her. They had not been long returned to the castle, when her husband knocked at the gate, by which she and the minstrels were equally immense flocks of parrots, paroalarmed. Fortunately the lady perceived in a neighbouring room three than our nocturnal visiters. I had to espy the conduct of his wife as usual, and after a short stay, went out anew, at which you may believe his wife was not dissatisfied. 'She instantly ran to the coffers to release the prisoners, for night was approaching and her husband would not be probably long absent. But what was her dismay, when she found them all suffocated! Lamentation, however, was useless, the main object now was to get rid of the dead bodies, and she had not a moment to lose. She ran then to the gate, and seeing a peasant go by; she offered him a reward of thirty livres, and leading him into the castle, she took him to one of the coffers, and showing him its contents, told him he must throw the dead bodies into the river: he asked for a sack, put the carcase into it, pitched it over the bridge, and then returned out of breath to claim the promised reward.

of certainly intend to satisfy you," said the lady, but you ought first to fulfil the condition of the bargain -you have agreed to rid me of the dead body, have you not? There, however, it is still." Saying this, she showed him the other coffer, in which the second bumpbacked minstrel had expired. At this sight the clown was perfectly confounded — "liow the devil come back! a sorcerer!"—bother stuffed the body into the sack and threw it, like the

to put the head down and observed that it sunk.

Meanwhile the lady had again changed the position of the coffers, so that the third was now in the place which had been successfully occupied by the two others. When the peasant returned, she showed him the remaining dead body—'you are right friend' said she, 'he must be a magician, for there he is again.' The rustic gnashed his teeth in rage. 'What the devil! am I to do nothing but carry this humpback?' He then lifted him up, with dreadful imprecations, and having tied a stone round the neck, threw him into the middle of the current threatening if he came out a third time, to despatch him with a cudgel. The first object that presented itself to the clown, on his way back for his reward, was the hunchbacked master of the castle, returning from his evening walk, and making towards the gate. At this sight the peasant could no longer restrain his fury. . Dog of a humpback, are you there again?' So saying, he sprung on the Chatelain, threw him over his shoulders and hurled him head. long into the river after the min-streis. ol'll venture a wager you have not seen him this last time," said the peasant entering the room where the lady was scated. She answered, she had not. "You were not far from it,' replied he, the sorcerer was already at the gate, but I have taken care of him—be at your ease he will not come back

The lady instantly comprehended what had occurred, and recompensed the peasant with much satisfac-

GREEN MONKIES.

An English officer, serving in the Colombian army, gives the fol-lowing particulars of the Green Monkies:- By night the trees were visited by groups of green monkies, who kept up such a horrible chatter as prevented our enjoying a single moment's repose until day, when we were beset by quets, and mackaws, more noisy compty coffers. Into each of these an opportunity of witnessing the lars.—a sum exceeds one half of ingenuity and cunning of the Indian the expense of the Louisiana purers, and then opened the gate to her | guides, one of whom proposed to husband. He had only come back ridus of the monkies, provided he got a handsome penknite as a reward. He went outside the trees with a bottle, in which he put some peas, putting down his fingers now and then, he took out some, which he cat with seeming satisfaction; leaving a few strewed around, he retired; and the monkies, who are very minute in their observation of men's actions, descended very cautiously, and having found some of the peas a quarrel ensued, but one more careful than the rest peeped into the bottle, and determining to secure a good handful, thrust down his hand, and filling it, he set up a titter, as he found he could not withdraw his hand; and all the tribe fled from branch to branch in evident agitation. Part of an old red jacket being procured, all hands went to work to make him a new suit of clothes, and after being dressed, he was let loose in the branches among his astonished companions, who collected around and gazing on him with curiosity about five minutes, a busy scene ensued the other monkies plucking branches and flogging the solder monkey, who jumped from branch to branch, pursued by the whole com-

other, over the bridge, taking care I throwing pistachin, limes and other fruits at us. Our women rode on donkies, one of which getting tired, and as beating would not make him go, he was abandoned; the, monkies, as usual, were attentive spectators, and seeing the donkey left, they descended to have a ride; three or four dozen mounted together on his ears and neck, and every other part, and even two clung to his tail while the others whipped and scratched him .- The donkey frightened by this novel treatment acquired new speed, and began cantering, while his pursuers as nimbly plied him. until he came up to our rear braying. The monkies now abandoned him, so severely scratched and torn that he never attempted to stop afterwards.

THE GEORGIA CONTROVERSY.

An Examination of the controversy between Georgia and the Greeks, has appeared in the New York Review. It is too long for insertion in the Eagle. The following condensed view of the subject, we believe embraces every thing essential to

In the year 1790, a treaty with the Creeks was concluded at N. York, in the presence of gen. Washington, by which the U.S. took the Creeks under their protection, guaranteed to them their lands within specific limits; and held out to them inducements to become herdsmen and cultivators, by engaging to furnish them gratuitously with useful domestic animals and implements of husbandry. In 1802, the government of the United States entered into an agreement with Georgia, by which the former engaged to extinguish for the use of Georgia, the Indian title to all the lands within that state, "as early as the same could be peaceably obtained on rea-sonable terms." The consideration given by Georgia on her part, was the relinquishment of all claims to the vacant territory in the west; for which however, she received an ample equivalent of $1,250,000 out of the first receipts from the sales of the lands, which together with sums paid to the Creeks for lands purchased of them in behalf of Georgia have cost the United States not less than eight millions of dol-15.000,000 of acres, to which the Indian title has been, extinguished. In 1814, another treaty was concluded with the Crecks, by which a certain portion of the Indian terri-tory was ceded, including upwards of 14000 square miles, and the United States guaranteed to the Creeks the integrity of all their remaining territory.

This treaty was considered by the Creeks as definitive; and conformably to that sentiment, shortly after its ratification, they passed laws constituting it a capital crimo to propose any further alienation of their lunds, now reduced to about 8,000 square miles.

At this period Mr. Troup became governor of Georgia. who immediately upon his instalment into the executive chair commenced a crusade against the Creeks, and against the general government, for the pursures against the Indians, for the purpose of compelling them to cede their lands contrary to the treaty, which stipulated that they were to be obtained peaceably and at a fair price;-to which treaty the Creeks were under no obligations; to cede their lands at all. The general government in compliance with
