Extract of a letter from an American Gentlems at Berlin, Prussia, to the editor of the N. Daily Advertiser, dated Dec. 15, 1825.

The sudden death of the Emperor Alexander has produced a sensation here unequalled by ar event since the battle of Waterloo -Every eye anxiously prying into the fature, and every hea is beating with anxiety, lest Europe, which has long enjoyed tranquillity, should again become the theatre of blood. As yet nothing has tran pired relative to the future measures of the Ro sian Government. That a great change w take place, which will give a new face to the fairs of Europe, seems more than probable. T character of Constantine, who is to succeed to t throne, is so different from that of the late Emp ror, and his views on many subjects are so d metrically opposite to those which have so gene ally prevailed at the Courts of the Continu since the Congress of Vienna, that it seems no to an impossibility that Europe should continue exhibit that tranquil aspect which it has do during the last ten years. The present Emper is represented as possessing violent passions, a as having a great dislike to Prince Letterne who has so long directed the Holy Allance. T influence of the Austrian Minister was so great over Alexander, as to induce him to withsta the ardent wishes of hisvaubjects, who with a exceptions, have for several years looked upont noble struggle of the Greeks, with the deepe sympathy. The unity of religious feeling between the Russian nation and the Greeks, has produc this sympathy, which has been not a little strengt ened by the barbarity of the Turks. The nation al unity is represented as now being so gre that the whole nation would rejoice to march Constanstinople, and that nothing but the au cratical power of Alexander, has enabled him withstand the ardent wishes of his subject destruction of a part of the city of St. Peers a year since, by the overflowing of the New, received by the nation as a judgment of Heav

an Greeks to suffer so long without affordi quire popularity among his subjects; comply witheir wishes, Constantinople must immediate fall. A large army is now assembled upon t Russian frontier, and the Turkish power has be so much weakened by the disasters of the thi last campaigns in Greece, that it could not asse ble an army great enough to oppose the overwhel ing force which Russia could easily send into To key. There is no Europear nower at present whi could present any obstacle to the progress of the Russian armies.—Prussie, to strong enough defend herself against Austria, trembles before t colossal power of the Czar, and would be ve unwilling to interfere in such a struggle. Her r sources are so limited, that she is at present t able to carry on an offensive war within her or territory, is in resources but little if at all sur rior to Prussia, and would not have it in her po er to oppose the Russian armies, before the of Constantinople was decided. England of send her fleets and perhaps destroy the Turk metropolis, but from such a warfare the Czarh nothing to fear but the destruction of the Russi commerce in the Mediterranean and Baltic, whi ould be a trifling sacrifice for the extensive ritory which he would add to his dominions. Russian army, according to Hassel, in 1819, mounted to 900,000 men. Since that time it been considerably augmented. The Austrian my amounts to 270,000, and the Prussian to 16 000 men. These two armies can present but lit resistance to the overwhelming power of the Rusian Emperor. The true policy of Prussia, well as of Austria, is not to interfere in such struggle, unless they should be supported by E glish gold, and by the armies of France.

Past experience has shown to England the fo of mingling in every continental struggle. It has thus far gained nothing but a few victors which the nation are beginning to feel were a po compensation for the great increase of her tax and of her national debt. Besides she has nothi to fear from Russia. The Russian fleet, eren Turkey should fall, must be too feeble to exc any uneasiness in the minds of the English natio India is too distant to be casily subdued; while, the fall of Turkey, the English commerce, if s should remain neutral, would probably be greatextended in the Black Sea, and on the shores the Archipelago.—France is so far removed fr the dominions of the Czar, that she has nothing dread, Her finances are at present so much e barrassed, that the French ministry would be ve unwilling to involve themselves he a war, wh must be carried on at an immense expence, at m than a thousand miles from her capital. Such ing the present state of Europe, there seem obstacle to the fall of Constantinople, should present Emperor of Russia desire it.
