MISCELLANY.
DREAMS.
 Oh! there is a dream of early youth,
 And it never comes again;
 'Tis a vision of light, of life and truth,
 That flits across the brain:
 And love is the theme of that early dream,
 So wild, so warm, so new,
 That in all our after years I seem,
 That early dream we rue.
 Oh! there is a dream of maturer years,
 More turbulent by far;
 'Tis a vision of blood, and of woman's tears,
 For the theme of that dream is war:
 And we toil in the field of danger & death,
 And shout in the battle array,
 Till we find that fame is a bodiless breath,
 That vanishes away.
 Oh! there is a dream of hoary age,
 'Tis a vision of gold in store—
 Of sums noted down on the figured page,
 To be counted o'er and o'er;
 And we fondly trust in our glittering dust,
 As a refuge from grief and pain,
 Till our limbs are laid on that last dark bed,
 Where the wealth of the world is vain.
 And is it thus from man's birth to his grave:
 In the path which all are treading?
 Is there nought in that long career to save
 From remorse and self-upbraiding?
 O yes, there's a dream so pure, so bright,
 That the being to whom it is given,
 Hath bathed in a sea of living light,
 And the theme of that dream is Heaven!

From the New-York Mirror.
LUCY GAY.
 That sweet and simple poet of nature, Burns, has in the commencement of his published correspondence, given two or three letters written by himself in the young days of love, when the bright beams of his fancy went abroad to revel in the sun light of poetry. Woman was then the spell which he tuned his harp, and touched as it was, by her fairy wand, the music that it discoursed was most eloquent. It was under the influence of an almost hopeless attachment that these letters were commenced, and the last one was written after he had received an answer from his mistress, which contained a refusal of his hand. Burns was ever a lover; from the first warblings of his muse, to its last rich breathings, his poetry was of a milder cast, and his fancy of a brighter hue, when beauty was his theme. But he, with all his bright genius, capable as it was of stealing us away from every thing cold and selfish, and transporting us to a home, as natural and innocent as that so beautifully portrayed in "The Cotter's Saturday night," and willing as he was to bow down at the feet of his fair one, still all would not obtain a smiling consent, and he was forced at that time to call up reason and subdue passion. I have spoken of Burns and those letters, because on the one hand, they are written in the natural and easy language of that author; and on the other, the sentiments are such as would flow from a heart where honour presided. Let young lovers peruse them.

There winds through the green meadows that spread themselves out in beauty around the village of Mid-Goatham, a silvery creek, which has been termed in the poetic language of lovers, the Fall-kill. Many a bright eye has gazed with pleasure on its waters, as it danced along in murmuring sweetness, over the pebbles, or slept in silence in the calm pool. But here was none that wandered there so often, to drink in the calm richness of the summer evening, or to allow fancy to play so widely like the waters, as Lucy Gay.

My heroine, smiling in beauty and innocence, was never alone when she rambled out to her favourite spot, where the creek after its various meanderings through the meadow, is formed by the hand of art, into a small lake, on the brow of a hill, but from which its waters escape over the rocks, and foam and tumble along until they pay their tribute into the broad bosom of the Hudson.

 To a young girl just budding into life; rich in every charm that floats in wild and playful beauty around her form; who has a smile for this one and a laugh for that; who finds there is an enjoyment in the company of the other sex which her own cannot afford; and who has around her many apparently willing to become suitors, there is a step necessary which in her experience it is almost impossible to take. All carry towards her the same urbanity in their manners, the same frank and open conduct, and why should she make a preference, or what ground has she to make that preference on? This was a question which Lucy Gay put to herself, but found it impossible to answer. She had many visitors; but two young men, in particular, appeared to single her out as their favourite. She studied the characters of both, and found herself willing to accept either; gave both opportunities for an explanation, yet received none. It was evident to her there existed between the two, a spirit of rivalry, yet it was impossible for her, under every circumstance, to destroy it. At length one dropt off; the other finding that the charm of opposition was gone, discontinued his visits also. It caused Lucy some melancholy moments, when she was left alone. She had endeavoured to conduct herself properly, and that reticence of conduct was evidently the cause of her trouble. She dwelt upon the circumstance, learned a lesson from it, and formed her resolution accordingly.

As luring as it is to the young of both sexes as many real and fancied pleasures as they enjoy—as sweet to ramble in evening's witching hour listening to the voice of beauty—and powerful as such influence may be, and rich as the enjoyment it creates is to the gay mind, still all these, Lucy Gay resolved to forego. That period of life with her had arrived, when she was willing to claim an endearing protection from man. The days of conquest trifling coquetry with her were over. She had always found the bitter mingled with the sweet, in those times. It was not long before the resolution she had formed was put in execution. There was one who singled her out for the object of his attention. He visited regularly, and his visits were received for a proper length of time—still no offer came—meet where they would, she must hang upon his arm—pay him all attention or apparent offence would be given—Lucy Gay then took the step which women scarcely ever dare take—yet one which will, under such circumstances, do them credit with the virtuous at all times. She asked him the motives for his visits. It became unexpected, to be sure. He hung down his head and merely mentioned company. He was desired to seek it elsewhere, if that was his only object. Lucy talked coolly; sketched to him the situation in which conduct like his placed girls. It prohibited them from all other company; the busy tongue of petty envy was allowed scope, and in the end, when their society ceased to give a charm, they were left with all those ten thousand tales connected with the circumstances, circulating at their expense. That beau never paid another visit; again and again Lucy was left without a suitor, from the same cause. Yet virtue works out its own reward at last.

cry of the locust, and almost continued evening song of the catydid, had weeks before been the harbinger of the approach of fall. I had wandered out then in company with Lucy Gay and her intended, the evening previous to their marriage, along the winding banks of the Fall-kill. It was an interesting scene.—I forgot the beauty of the landscape, mellowed into sweetness by the mild light of the full faced moon, as I gazed upon her who had wandered to that scene so often. I dwelt upon the incident of courtship through which she passed, and the correctness of her conduct. He who was to dance gaily with her in life's journey, or cling together through its thorny way, had been an old schoolmate of mine. He had stood aloof for long time from female society, only waiting for one to whom he could make honourable advances, when acquainted with Lucy Gay. With them acquaintance soon ripened into attachment, and they were married. If there is now a happy couple in the village of Mid-Goatham it is them.

I intended to convey a moral with my story. This much may be learned. When you wish to become a suitor, choose a proper opportunity, and tell your mistress of it candidly.—Then, if you are accepted, you need never fear opposition; that is, if the lady acts as honourable a part as you do.—Then, too, you destroy the power of a coquet. You are properly served if you visit, and go through what you believe a courtship, and in the end, when you seriously address her, she laughs in your face. Put not your peace of mind so much in the power of any one. Many a woman will tease you a little at times, unless she properly understands your intentions, and it is her privilege to do so. Ladies, to you I will merely say—if a gentleman addresses you for an unreasonable length of time, without disclosing his intentions, either dismiss him or do as Lucy Gay did.

SELECTIONS FROM A LATE ENGLISH JOURNAL.
CURE FOR THE TOOTH-ACHE.
 At a recent meeting of the London Medical Society, Dr. Blake stated that the extraction or excision of teeth was unnecessary. He was enabled, he said, to cure the most desperate cases of tooth-ache (unless the disease was connected with rheumatism) by the application of the following remedy to the diseased tooth:—"Alum, reduced to an impalpable powder, two drachms; nitrous spirit of ether, seven drachms; mix, and apply them to the tooth." Mr. Fay, the American dentist, who was present, admitted, with much candour, that in 95 cases out of 100, where surgeons and dentists are applied to for the purpose of extraction, relief might be obtained without that, or even excision. It may, therefore, be worth while to try the remedy prescribed by Dr. Blake, as unlike many of the nostrums of the present day, it cannot do any harm, but it does not appear to possess the character of a specific. Mr. Fay submitted his instruments for excision and extraction, to the inspection of the meeting, and he received some well-merited encomiums for the improvement which he has introduced in the practice of the dentist.
