Court, has been considered.
It is, thereupon, this tenth day of July, in the year 1827, by the Court

It is also adjudged, ordered and decreed, that in the distribution of the of my father's personal estate shall have been made by his executors, and upon such settlement there should appear a balance to be due over and above the property willed by him to be sold in payment of his debts, in such case I shall always be prepared and ready to pay over any proportion, that may be answerable to pay for the final discharge of his debts, and not until then. I do hereby caution all persons not to become purchasers of a part of my property, as advertised, said executors, called 'Hammond's

RECOLLECTIONS OF PARIS.
The Palais Royal that wonderful epitome of every thing that is splendid and detestable, and luxurious and vicious in the world! The entrance is from the Rue St. Honore, through large iron gates guarded by soldiers —after passing these, and a vestibule enriched with exquisite specimens of sculpture, the visitor arrives at the palace itself, which is in the form of an immense parallelogram, the central portion being open to the Heavens, and the sides consisting of splendid buildings, of 5 stories in height. The lower story is divided into ranges of shops, where are exposed in the most tempting manner, books, pictures, jewellery, china, glass, &c. so that the eye is actually wearyed with their variety, and dazzled with their magnificence. In front of those shops, is a large and beautiful colonnade, separated from the open square, by iron railings, with gates at proper intervals; the roof is skylighted, (if I may coin a word) and supported by slender and graceful pillars—it is here that the Parisians resort in the evening "pour l'amuser"—to see and to be seen.
The motley crowd alone, is diverting enough to the stranger; rich and poor; genteel and simple; well dressed and ill-dressed; soldiers and citizens; ladies and grisettes—all alive to the pleasures of the moment, and all chattering as though their temporal existence depended upon their volubility. And ever and anon, a silent Englishman stalks along, sufficiently cognizable by his dress, scrupulously neat, but differing in fashion from that of the volatile Frenchman, by his sedate and solid walk; and the profound, yet puzzling air with which he seems to speculate upon the wonders that surround him in this region of enchantment. As the evening advances, the scene is enlivened by the appearance of beautiful girls, tastefully dressed, and smiling upon all they meet, who yet have something in their look that tells too plainly to what miserable class of beings they belong, and whose blooming smiles excite compassion rather than pleasure. Above the shops, are the Cafes, and the Estaminets, and the Restaurants; among the others the celebrated Cafe des Mille Colonnnes, and the still more celebrated rooms of Very and Beauvilliers. The Cafe des Mille Colonnnes, well deserves its reputation for splendor and magnificence.
Numerous pillars of white marble, with gilded capitals, and carefully arranged so as to divide the room into compartments of equal size; and the walls and doors, and the spaces between the pillars are covered with plates of looking glass instead of tapestry so that on every side, long ranges of reflected columns meet the eye, interminable and innumerable.
At one end of this fairy temple of pleasure, behind a sort of altar decorated with flowers, sits the priestess, a beautiful girl and elegantly habited, whose sole employment seems to be to receive the compliments and pretty sayings of the company—and the money from the attendants. The visitors on entering all salute her with a bow, at least; and those who are personally acquainted with her, approach and pay their respects, or introduce their friends, with the same attention and politeness, as they would use in private society.

LETTER FROM SPAIN.
Barbazon, (Spain,) May 12, 1827.
I had last night an opportunity of witnessing the wretched condition of the people who inhabit small villages, for it being rather late, and as I had twelve miles to ride before reaching this town, I was advised to stop at a miserable place called Quintanilla Delamata. This village is composed of about one hundred and fifty houses, or rather huts, and it is difficult to imagine that human beings can exist in such a state of destitution. Not one single dwelling place would be thought too good for the pigs in England, and the children were prowling about, nearly naked, in a half famished condition. There is a total want of industry, for, though the soil around is most excellent, nothing is done to render it productive, and I do not see how the inhabitants can exist otherwise than by plunder or assassination.
I have remarked, that taking away every third village, out of a distance of about fifteen miles, you are sure to find one at least which has the same appearance of misery as Quinta Delamata. It is impossible to judge of the present state of Spain by merely stopping at the post towns, for the accommodations there are excellent, but it is necessary to visit the small villages, such as the one in question, and I think it difficult to imagine a state of more utter destitution and ignorance than is to be witnessed there. The place where I slept was, of course, called an inn, but there was nothing to eat but bread and eggs, and a miserable bed of straw was my resting place.
The master, with all the ease imaginable, told me to bring up my portmanteau, and he gave me to understand that I should be accommodated to the utmost of my desire.

Barbazon, (Spain,) May 12, 1827.
miserable place called Quintanilla De-
the children were prowling about,
wise than by plunder or assassination.
ping at the post towns, for the accom-
place where I slept was, of course,
eat but bread and eggs, and a misera-
The master, with all the ease imagin-
utmost of my desire.

Public Sale.
The subscribers will offer at public sale to the highest bidder, on Monday 10th day of September next, at Warfield. At the same time and place, land, lying to the south west of the tract, and adjoins the lands of Mr Anderson Warfield. At the same time, will be offered.

150 acres of land, being part of Hammond's Fifth Conwell adapted to the growth of Indian corn, tobacco, rye, oats &c and has a fine efficiency of wood and timber, adjoining the lands of Caleb Sappington and John Short. At the same time
