And fear no reproaches,
And fear no reproaches,
For riding in ooe;
But duly be jogging,
Whilst whistling and flogging,
Whilst whistling and flogging,
The coachman drives on.
Parquhar.

Disguised in a grey surtout which had seen service, a white castor on my head, and a stout Indian cane in my hand, the next week saw me on the top of a mail couch driving to the westward.

I like mail coaches, and I hate them. The man coaches, and I hate them. I like them for my convenience, but I detest them for setting the whole world a gadding, instead of setting quietly still minding their own business, and preserving the stamp of originality of character which nature or education character which nature or education may have impressed on them.

Off they go, jingling against each other in the rattling vehicle, till they have no more variety of stamp in them than so many smooth shilling—the same even in their Welsh wires and great coats, each without more indivi-duality than belongs to a partner of the company, as the waiter calls them, of e north coach. Worthy Mr. Piper, best of contracjades for public use. I bless you when A set out on a journey myself; the neat coaches under your contract render the intercourse from Johnie Groat's hous to Ladykick and Cornhill Bridge safe pleasant and cheap. But, Mr. Piper, you, who are a slirewd arithmetician, did it never occur to you to calculate how many feel's heads which migh have produced an idea or two in the year, if suffered to remain in quiet, go effectually addied by jolting to and from in these flying chariots of yours; how many decent countrymen become con-ceited bumpkins after a cattle show dinner in the capital, which they could not have attended save for your means. how many decent country parsons return critics and spouters, by way of importing the nowest taste from Edin bargh? And how will your conscience answer one day for carrying so man bonns lasses to barrer modes y t onceit and levity at the metropolitar Vanicy Fair? Consider, too, the lov rate to which you reduce human intel-lect. I do not believe your habitual customers have their ideas more en larged, than one of your coach horses. They know the road, like the English I ney know the real, the the English postioon, and they know nothing oesides. They date, like the carriers to Gadshill, from the death of John Osler; the succession of guards forms a dynasty to them; coacimen are men. ministers of state, and an upset is to them a greater incident than a chang-of administration. Their only point of interest on the road is to save the time,

Take my advice, my good sir, and disinterestedly contrive that once or twice a quarter, your most besterou. whip shall overturn a coach full of these superfluous travellers, in terrorem to those who, as Horace save, 'de light in the dust attracted by your hour. This is surely a miserable de-

Chariots. Your current and customary mail coach passenger, too, gets atominably selfish, schemes successfully for the best seat, the freshest egg, the right cut of the surloin. The mode of tra velling is death to all the courtesies and kindnesses of life, and goes a great way to demoralize the character, and cause it to retrogade to barbirism. You al low us excellent dinners, but twenty minutes to eat them, and wha is the consequence! Bashful beauty sits on one side of us, timid childhood on the other; respectable, yet some what feeble old age is placed on our front; and all require those acts of po-liteness which ought to put every degree upon a level at the convival board. But have we time—we, the strong and active of the party-to perform the du- U ties of the tible to the more retired and bashful, to whom these little arren are due? The lade pressed to her chick, the old man helphave we to bestow on any other per sons but ourselves; and the prut prut tut of the guard's discordant note, summons us to the coach, the weaker party having gone without their dinner. and the able bodied and active threat ened with indigestion from having swallowed victuals like a Leistershire clown bulting bacon. On the memor able occasion I am speaking of Phos my breakfast, sheerly from obtaing the commands of a respectable looking old lady, who once required me to ring the bell, and another time to help the
