100 Dollars Reward.
Ran away from the farm of the late John P. Finkney, near Annapolis, a negro man named BEN WOOLLEN, aged about thirty years, five feet ten inches high, of a dark complexion, the other named BEN SPOWEN, about 19 years old, five feet six inches high, very black and well made. It is supposed that these negroes went away in company with a bright mulatto man named Henry Wallace, belonging to Mrs. John Driec. The clothing of the above negroes is not known. A reward of $100 dollars will be given for the apprehension of the two negroes, or twenty five for each, if taken within thirty days, and secured in jail so that I get them again; or one hundred dollars for each, or fifty for each if taken out of the state.

MASQUEBADA.
The rig for masquebada in New York, generally, subjected seven ad valorem to take place this week. The boat at the Park theatre, is to have some imitation of the carnival at Venice. At Tammany Hall, there will be a grand Spanish ball on Monday, the 21st inst. We do not intend to describe the masquebada, but we do intend to say that the masquebada, which has been conducted for several years past, is the best and most successful of the kind.

MISCELLANY.
From the (N. J.) Eagle.
THE LAY OF THE DEMON OF NIGHT.
When the wild wind blows
Is its fearful night,
And the pale moon throws
But a feeble light,
When the stars are at rest
In their homes in the sky,
And the light clouds haste
In their swiftness by—
I love on the craggy rock to stand,
And brave the storm with a giant's hand.
When the sea-gull screams
Over the rolling wave,
And the sea-lion dreams
In his lonely cave,
When the sentinel sleeps
On his weary post,
And the wanderer weeps
For the home he has lost—
I gaze in pride on the world's darkened
men—
The dreary king of a dreary scene.
When the dark sea roars
In its wakened wrath,
And destruction lowers
Over the mariner's path,
When the cowardly slave
Shrinks back in affright,
And the noble brave
Turns away from the sight—
I perch on the top of the steepest mast,
And laugh when the whelming wave has past.
When the murderer goes,
To deal his blow,
With a fiendish power,
As he leans over the bed
Of his destined prey,
Who hears not his tread,
And who heeds not his way—
I am there! I am there! at his right hand,
I nerve his arm and I speed his brand.
On the tempest I ride
On the bounding wave,
From my island of pride
Which the north sea lare,
I hover when death
And destruction are nigh
To hear the last breath
And to catch the last sigh;
Ye may see me at midnight when the wild
blast howls loud,
Abroad in the storm & arrayed in a shroud.

A SHIRT
I asked a lady—not a girl,
How many pieces made a shirt?
You'll put a piece on either side—
Two gussets, and two shoulder straps;
Two waist bands, and then, perhaps
You'll put two pieces on the neck,
My stars—of pieces here's a neck!
I think, my lady, with your leave,
That each arm will want a sleeve—
What next, my lady, will you find us?
Two little gussets, and two binders,
A collar, boy, heat and fill!
And there I think your list will fill—
And so they'd need, I'm sure there's plenty,
Count the number—there's just twenty.

From the Philadelphia Souvenir.
THE HOUSE ON THE CLIFF.
On the morning of a fine day, in the spring of 1819, I embarked in a Durham boat, at Easton, Pa. for Philadelphia. I passed my time pleasantly in listening to the songs and anecdotes of the boatmen, and viewing the beautiful and sometimes sublime scenery presented on either side. At one place, the shore receded with a gentle upward slope until they attained the importance of hills, appearing blue in the distance, at another they stood proudly up, looking upon the fresh blooming lowlands. But in a particular place, the appearance was as if a mountain, by some powerful convulsion, had been severed in the midst, for the lofty precipices on each side were about the same height, and the projecting crags appeared as if they once articulated as a geological anatomist would say. The river there grew narrower in its channel, and dashed and foamed and roared among a thousand rocks that interdicted its course. Such passages are called falls; and according to the hyperbole of the boatmen, the boat rushed through them at the rate of "a mile a minute." Many of the rocks are overflown by the water, especially at the time of freshets. Those would cause the wreck of many a poor man's hopes, but that their situations are marked by a line of poles that have been erected on them, and from which wave the red flags of warning. In passing these falls, the heaving waves occasion much difficulty to the boatmen, dash over the sides of the boat, and demanding the constant labour of its conductors to prevent their becoming overwhelmed. According to my remembrance, not many houses overlooked the river, but I noticed one that I must particularize. It stood on the Pennsylvania shore, immediately on the brow of one of the opposite cliffs I have mentioned, and it seemed so small that you might have imagined an eagle had flown off with it, and placed it there, to build its nest in. I happened to be acquainted with the history of this house, and therefore I longer delay in describing it. I will begin by telling you that it was built by a man who was a native of Trenton.

top, young, brave, able, and enterprising—a thorough patriot—and who entered the army he had plighted vows with a young lady of his native place— one endowed with all the qualities, both of spirit and of person, that constitute true loveliness. Her father had been one of the first victims of the war, leaving his widow and only daughter, with all the timidity natural to women, to suffer the vicissitudes of the times that tried men's souls. The death of Elizabeth's father, and the dangerous incident of the station of the captain, had deferred the marriage; and when the retreating army was forced to abandon Trenton, they parted from each other, with a sadness that seemed ominous of approaching misfortune. When the Hessians entered Trenton, they considered the flying Americans as harmless as if disabled, and resigning themselves to every species of dissipation. One of their sergeants named Baum, quartered himself at the house of Mr. Gardiner, and exercised a high authority in regard to his comforts. The lone widow would have had to endure even greater impositions than she did, had it not been that the sergeant took a fancy to Elizabeth, in consequence of which, whenever she was in his presence, his nature appeared less rude than usual, and his whole behaviour assumed a cast wonderfully sentimental. These manifestations of partiality became more striking every time Elizabeth appeared before him, until, at last he openly avowed his feelings, and became lavish in his efforts to obtain her favour. Being unfortunately repulsed, he soon grew violent, and at one time, he muttered a hint of employing force if he should find entreaty of no avail. Elizabeth and her mother were so well acquainted with the course of war, that they were greatly alarmed by this threat, altho' they still hoped military discipline possessed sufficient authority to prevent a subaltern putting such a threat in execution. Baum became more importunate daily, but Elizabeth remained the same as at first. Concluding at last that she would never be won over to his purpose, he resolved to remove her to some place where she would be completely in his power, and where he would be beyond the cognizance of his superiors. With this view he sought and obtained permission to select twenty men, and keep a watch over the adjacent country. He soon conformed those men to his designs, by persuading them that Mrs. Gardiner had a large quantity of specie concealed in her house, and promised to divide it among them as a reward for their service. Having gained this point, he devoted an entire day to the discovery of a situation suited to the purpose. He bent his course up the Delaware, for some miles, when he arrived at the opposite cliffs, described in the commencement of my narrative. The Pennsylvania side seemed most secure, and he therefore crossed the river. He then divided his men, and dispatched them up and down along the shore, in quest of a proper place of concealment. In the mean time, he ascended with some difficulty the jutting crags, and was delightfully surprised on finding, about half way from the ground to the top of the cliff, a fine spacious cave, extending backward into the rocks nearly twenty feet. The entrance was almost entirely obscured by a wild briar that sprung up from the earth in a crevice, and climbing from point to point spread its bare twigs thickly around. It was precisely appropriate. He returned to the opening immediately, and by the preconcerted signal of the shrill sounding file, recalled his companions. Then, crossing the river, he marched back to Trenton.

The next evening Mrs. Gardiner and Elizabeth were sitting by the fireside, reviewing the behaviour of sergeant Baum, when a Hessian woman entered the door. Addressing Elizabeth, she said—
I came to see, Miss, if you ain't the young lady that has been looking to the sick woman, down yonder on the river shore.
Do you mean old Mrs. Williams? enquired Elizabeth.
I don't know her name, answered the woman, but her house is just at the foot of your garden.
That is Mrs. Williams. What message do you bring her?
Why, I was just going by the door, when a little boy ran out and told me his grand mother was very sick, and asked me to go in and see her. And so, when I went in, I did find the old woman out o'casts, and she wanted me to come up here, and ask you if you could't throw your cloak over her, and come down there a minute. So I told her I would do a trifle of that kind, and I came up here right away.
My dear, said Mrs. Gardiner, I hardly think it proper you should ven-
