*Come home-come home!" Mri. Hemsa's Resall.

I conte-I come! There's a sound of joy,

Of music in the world:

Oh, that the rapid winds might bear

Me onward like a bird!

I'm weary with these wanderings,

My heart is sad and lone:

Oh, for the treasured sounds of home,

To wake an answering tone!

To wake an answering tone!
The voices of my happy home!
The miste of the heart!
How of those gentle whisperings come—
Alas! how soon depart!
I hear them when the forest wind
Is breathing forth its song,
And in the murmurings of the wave
That bears my bark along.

Why should I waken memory of that far blissful home? Of that far blissful home?
'Twill fling a deeper gloom upon
The lonely path I roam.
Yet fancy loves to wander forth,
And hover round the hearth—
To eatch those gleaming looks of love
That light the scenes of mirth.

I come—I come! Why should I rove
A dreary wild like this, A dreary wild like this, When a voice below'd recalls me back To share life's all of bliss? e-I come! like the weary bird I come—I come! like the west,
At ere to its sheltered nest;
Like the pilgrim from afar I come
To a blessed shrine of rest!

ALVISE SANUTO.

A Venetian Story. Alvise Sanuto was a young man of whom his country entertained the proudest hopes. His courage had been gloriously tried in the battle of Lepanto, in which he had performed prodigies of valour. His prudence and foresight had been often the subject of admiration in the great coun-cil of state. The old man, his father, esteemed him as the ornament and grace of his family. pointed to him as one of her best ci-

At that period both public and private manners were exceedingly severe. The ladies, who gave law to them, only issued from their homes to go to church, wrapped up in a weil which hid their face and figure. The balconies of the palaces still present signs of this ancient severity, the parapets being purposely made so high and large, as to render it difficult to see from them. Alvise had a heart of the most passionate and fiery nature; he felt the imperious sway of love, but as yet had met with no lady on whom he could bestow his affections. The arrival of the French Ambassador at Venice, in great pomp, excited public curi-The manners of the strangers bore an aspect of perfect novelty to the inhabitants of the republic. as the ladies who accompanied Ame lia, the ambassador's daughter, displayed a fire and vivacity, which to many seemed scandalous as well as astonishing. Amelia was in her seventeenth year, and to cultivated and sprightly powers of mind, added those French graces, which, if they donot constitute beauty, are still more effectual than beauty itself in seducing the beholder. Alvise saw her when she was presented to the Doge, and regarded her as a being more than human. He gazed on her as it beside himself; and what female could have beheld him without ad miration? Amelia read in the noble countenance of Alvise what he felt pitated within her bosom. Alvise from that day was another being. He knew his unhappy state, and that his misfortunes could end but with his life, since the severe and unyielding laws of his country rendered all hope chimerical of ever be his ardent fancy suggested to at-tempt any means of again seeing her who was dearer to him than life.— His abode was divided from that of the ambassador by a narrow canal.
