THE SAR OR BOY Written for the "New York Atlas." irTempt not the Sea!" my father said;
His locks were white with see.

And low he boxed his reverend head
Upon the bible's page.

"Dare not the waves, my William dear?"
My tender mother cried;
I saw the big unbidden tear,
I and turned away and sighed.

There was an eye I could not meet—
I dared not bid farewell;
And yet its gentle glance was sweet,—
How sweet—I feared to tell.

For oh! the Sea-the Sea had bound My heart in wizard chain;

ly hoyhood knew no tuneful sound

Like the storm-stricken main And when bright fancies o'er my soul, Like dreams, their sway would urge, The sapphire waves would proudly roll,

And now the broad, deep Sea I crossed, A truant sailor boy: And when its wildest billows tossed, I laughed and leaped for joy. Weeks passed. The midnight storm was Half deafen'd by the sound, I reckless climbed the slippery shroud, And fell in gulfs profound.

On went the ship. With shouts of woe
My gasping lips were dried;—
High rolled the waves with crests of snow,
And all my hopes defied. Methought old Earth's foundations rocked With warring Ocean's strife; And scomful winds, like elemons, mocked My breathless toll for life

And there, upon that black expanse And there, upon that black expanse,
Like a torn weed I clump.
While maddening breakers held their dance,
And the hourse tempest sung.
Up came the dawn. With pain I raved,
And then for joy would weep;
Methought it walked like Christ, who saved
The feithless on the deep.

A shower of hair, like rays of light, Fell found me, dashed with blood; I knew my father's locks so white.
Who strewed them on the flood? A cottage, with its peaceful-thatch
And tapered casement, glowed,
Hasting, I pressed its well known latch,
And burning laza flowed.

Close to my car a monster sung.
