made sail again, still on to Boston. We saw a schooner and a brig, and so on, but did not speak them. The land we made was off New York, called the Woodlands, the other side of Bernegat. A schooner from New York was standing off-I was at the helm. John said. Keep right to the schooner, I want to speak her? We got close to the schooner, and we hailed her 'Where from?' From New York' When did you leave?' "Last night.' What kind of winter have you had here?' 'A very hard winter as ever was known.' What land kind of winter have you had here?' 'A very hard winter as ever was known.' 'What land is this abreast of us?' 'He did not know exact iv.' Our people watked off, and said, 'John, where's Boston now?' John said, 'one place is as good as another.' We went on, the wind fresh from south. By and by it came on to blow. Took a reef in the main and foretopsail; then he hauled off by the wind, (I was at the helm) till dark. As soon as dark he veered the brig round, and run her direct for New York light house, on Sandy Hook. He got within three miles of the land. As soon as he found he was nigh enough in, he hove the brig to. Then John and Philip cut a hole in the brig. Then they got into the long boat to leave her. They lashed the helm a midships, so that the brig should be kept full. They all got into the boat but myself. I got in last. I got hold of the rope to drop into the boat; John sung out, 'Let go,' They said, 'The steward has not got aboard yet.' I got in. John says, 'I wish the steward was overboard.' We then made sail, and steered for the light house, and reached it just saday was breaking. Mansfield said, 'I expect we shall be found out by that reached it just as day was breaking.
