MISCELLANY.

From the United States Gazette.

I love to muse by the river heach,
When the stars are shining o'er me'
When the breaking wave doth a moral teach,
As it flashes in light before me.

The air is like a tideless sea Of pure and silvery light, And the waters glance transparently, Ill-uined by the queen of night.

The crested waves as they dash on high, And dissolve in pearly heads, Appear as a carpet spread gaudily, Where the giant sea-god treads. The stars that glance up so peacefully,
Seem set in the river's bed,
And the restless leaves of the popular tree
Make music o'er my head.
On such a night did the Indian woo,
And win his dasky brides

And win his dasky bride.

On such, did he vow to he ever taue,
As they sat by this river's shade. She look'd upon the studded sky, As he told his flattering tale; Her dark eyes sparkling brilliantly, When seen by the moon-beams pale.

He pointed to the evening star—
'T'is reflected at my feet—
And told her of a home afar,
Where faithful lovers meet.

He told her, when this life was o'er, 'That they'd visit that shining isle; And sit npon that golden shore, Where he'd revel in her smile. But list to the sound of that thrilling note!

'Tis the lover's serenade; And his heart beats quick, 'that his lay may float To his own loved blue eyed maid. And she is sleeping sweetly now— Her eve-fids darkly fringed, While a shade like thought is on her brow, Anp her cheek is slightly tinged.

She's dreaming of her own true loves, By the smile upon her lip; She dreams of a fount like that above, Where their wings the angels dip.

Tis the fount of love, as pute and deep.

As the faith to spirits given—

Tis blissful, for this maid asleep
Imagines it like to heaven.

But the winds are rising in their might,
And the clouds stalk blackly on—
I know there'll be a storm this night,
For the sky's pure blue has gone.

And an end I must take of my reverie,
And hie to my lonely bed;
For I hear the tempest demon's cry,
As it echoes over my head

THE STORY OF FATHER NICHOLAS.

BY M'KENZIE. Formal precepts and hypothetical cautions are indeed frequently offered to youth and experience, in a manner so ungracious as neither to command their attention, nor conciliate their liking. He who says I am to instruct and to warn, with a face of instruction or admonition, prepares his audience for hearing what the young and the lively always avoid as tiresome, or fear as unpleasant. A more willing and a deeper impression will be made when the observation arises without being prompted, when the understanding is addressed through the feelings. It was this which struck me so forcibly in the story of Father Nicholas-I never felt so strongly the evils of dissipation, nor ever was so ashamed of the shame of being virtuous.

It were small town in Brittany, in which there was a Convent of Benedictines, where particular circumstances had induced me to take up my residence for a few weeks. They had some pictures which strangers used to visit—I went with a party whose purpose was to look at them—mine in such places is rather to look at men. If in the world we behold the shifting scene which prompts observation, we see in such secluded societies a sort of still life; which nourishes thought, which gives subject for meditation. I con fess, however, I have often been disappoint ed; I have seen a group of faces under owls, on which speculation could build nothing; mere common place countenances, which might have equally well belonged to a cor-poration of Bakers or Butchers. Most of those in the Convent I now visited were of that kind: one however was of a very superior order; that of a Monk, who kneeled at a distance from the Altar, near a Gothic window, through the painted panes of which a gleany light touched his forehead, and threw a dark REMBRANDY shade on the hollow of a large black, melancholy eye. It was impossible not to take notice of him. He looked up, involuntarily no doubt, to a picture of our Saviour bearing his cross; the similarity of the attitude, and the quiet resignation of the two countenances, formed a resemblance that could get but strike every one. It is Father Nicholas, whispered our conductor, who is of all the brotherhood the most rigid to himself, and the kindest to other men. To the distressed, to the sick, and to the dying he is always ready to administer assistance and consolation. No body over told him a misfortune in which he did not take an interest, or request a good office
