From the New-York Constellation.
WHO IS A GENTLEMAN?
The answer to this question, among Americans, depends generally upon the condition, feelings, and particular modes of thinking, of those who undertake to answer it; and, consequently, he who is very much of a gentleman in the estimation of one person, is no gentleman at all in the opinion of another.

A gentleman, in the estimation of mine host, is one who calls freely for all the good things appertaining to the bar, the wine cellar and the table; pays his bills punctually, without disputing the items or the prices; and speaks in flattering terms of every thing about his landlord's premises, from the beds in the attic to Betty in the kitchen.

With waiters and ostlers, a gentleman is one who is flush of his cash; who, after having paid their master as much as their services are worth, pays them four times their value into the bargain. "Massa Dash," says Corfee, "he be one real gemman; he gib me half a dollar for brush his boots, tree quarter dollar for hold his horse, and whole dollar for callin' him a gemman. And he be first rate gemman—no mistake."

A gentleman, with Dolly, the chambermaid, is one who says a soft thing to her, praises her good looks, compares her cheeks to the damask rose, her lips to red-cherries, her eyes to the planet Venus, and her waist to an hour glass; and who, to prove the sincerity of his soft nothings, gives her occasionally a sly kiss, a gentle squeeze of the hand, and a bright silver dollar.

A dandy's estimate of a gentleman is based on a foundation peculiarly his own. He is not a creature who has any thing to do with money, sense, feelings, flesh or blood. He is wholly a factitious animal, made up by the tailor, the sempstress, the cordwainer, the hatter, and the corset manufacturer. He is, to be sure, a creature that walks, talks and eats; but he does all these from no ordinary motive. He walks merely to show his gentlemanly figure; he talks only because he never thinks; and he eats for the same reason that his tailor uses padding, viz. to fill out his proportions.

With a duelist, he is no gentleman who refuses to fight a duel. He may enact as many villainous tricks as he pleases; he may seduce the weak, betray the confiding, cheat the honest, and murder the unsuspecting—all these do not detract one whit from his gentlemanly pretensions. But if he refuses to stand up and be shot at, he is no gentleman. Having complied with this requisite, he is a gentleman. Every inch of him, adultery, treachery and murder, to the contrary notwithstanding.

With the gay Miss, who never breathes freely except in the atmosphere of folly and show, a gentleman is one who exerts himself to promote her wishes; who gallants her to theatres, balls and sleigh-rides; who neglects his business to attend to her amusements; who spends his money to advance her pleasures; who, in a word, is pretty much, if not altogether, a lady's man.
But with the young lady's maiden aunt, a staid gentleman of forty, the gentleman is still a different personage. He is the essence of respectful attention; and does not indicate, by word, look, or action, that he suspects her of being older than she was once; or that he prefers the company of younger Misses.
With old ladies of revolutionary times, a gentleman is one who wears a three-cornered hat; has his hair tied behind, and powdered all over; and has his shirt ruffled, as the great man of the times would have it, with a long waistcoat, with pocket flaps, who wears silver buckles that reach from side to side of his well saved shoes; who walks with a dog-headed cane; and who, in his manners, neglects no item of the ceremony of olden times.

The pit-a-pat heart of a susceptible girl of sixteen, tells her that a gentleman is a tall fellow with a fine military cap on his head; a blue coat turned up with red facings; a sword by his side; a neat pair of whiskers; a measured step, and a "How d'ye do, my charming Miss? You are the loveliest creature I ever beheld—upon my soul you are!"

Miss Phillis, too—the bab her gemman. And me be a brack a man, trait as a lamp-post, wid wite teeth, roly eye, shiny skin, flatty foot, plumpy lip, broad nose—a nigger who wear a red coat, be de colour what it will who fiddle like pollo, dance like Frenchman, make two tree bow in a minute, and say, "O luddy! Missy Phillis, your unpalatable beauty hab set my heart on fire, O glue pot!"

Among fox hunters, a gentleman is a fellow who can leap a five barred gate, jump a twenty foot ditch, thread the windings of a forest at full gallop, smell the tract when the hounds are at fault, be the first at the death of Reynard, dip the brush in a bowl of punch, and drink the washings of a fox's tail.

With a country housewife, he is every bit of a gentleman who praises her domestic accomplishments; extols her cooking, admires the neatness of her house, and pats the heads of her children; who prefers molasses to sugar, in sweetening his coffee; eats sour bread without a wry face; despaches the worst articles on her table with the best relish; rises at the crowing of the cock; and washes his face at the pump, instead of disarranging her ewer and bason, which are kept for show.

A sailor's gentleman is a bit of a tar. He is a man who can box the compass; knot, splice, haul, reef and steer; who can run aloft with the nimbleness of a cat; and keep his footing on a rope, as fearless as a spider on his web. Who recka little wether he sleeps in his hammock, on the round top, or at the bottom of the ocean; who fears neither storms, nor billows nor a hostile sail; who cares not a groat for money; whose hand is ever open at the cry of distress; who loves his wife next to his ship; cannot abide a fellow who comes in at the cabin window; hates meanness, and despises a land lubber.

EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the packet ship Pacific, Capt. Crocker, the editors of the New-York Journal of Commerce have received London papers to Jan. 15th, and Liverpool to the 16th, both inclusive.

The Mint Robbery.—The government has adopted the most likely method of effecting the apprehension of Keith, who is charged with stealing in the Mint gold blanks for coining sovereigns, of the value of £2,000. Police officers have been dispatched to France and Holland, to Dublin and Edinburgh, and also to the different sea port towns in England in pursuit of him.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The general tone of remark in the English papers on the President's late Message, is decidedly favourable. The Morning Chronicle says:
"The feeling expressed by the American President towards this country must produce its effect here. The time seems at length arrived when we may hope to see the two branches of the same family forgetting past animosities and jealousies, availing themselves in a friendly and cordial manner of resources of each other. It is but just to the Americans to observe, that there has never been any want of disposition on the part of the leading men of that country to avail themselves of every symptom of good will manifested towards them in England. There is nothing new, therefore, in the manifestation of Gen. Jackson on this occasion; and we expected as much from him. When Mr. Canning held out the hand of good fellowship a few years ago and attempted to revive the old family feelings between the mother and the daughter, the effect produced in America was almost electrical. It appears that the Americans have nothing so much at heart as the most intimate connection with us, short of interference with the internal affairs of each other. In this liberal view, England and America grow with the growth of each other. There can be no cause for jealousy; for it is as impossible for America to injure England in Europe as for England to injure America in the other hemisphere. The proper way of viewing the two countries is to consider them one in all that is beneficial, and merely separated for purposes beneficial to each domestic government. It is the interest of both countries to multiply their relations with each other as much as possible, that they may have always the strongest interest to be on the best terms with each other. Let both nations retrace their steps; let England encourage the application of American capital to land, by offering a ready market for agricultural produce of all kinds; and America cease to encourage by restrictions the capital to manufactures. In this way both would thrive. If this liberal policy be resorted to, a war between the two countries will be viewed by the people of both as little less unnatural than a civil war. The great secret for avoiding war is to make it the interest of both nations to be at peace, and to make them sensible of their interest.

FROM THE LONDON SUN.

The message of the President of the U. S. is a document of a very mild and conciliatory tone towards this country, and indeed towards the world generally. The rapid progress made, and making towards the final reduction of the national debt is highly important to the interests of the American people—and we should be happy could the example be followed nearer home. The message of Gen. Jackson will be a greatly disappointing one, because war has been the warlike spirit which has been hitherto rather conspicuously exhibited. But the inspired to arms, the President is not insensible to the less obstructive, but more, beneficial arts of peace.

From the Times

Upon the personal which we have been enabled to give this very voluminous but important paper, we must say, that since the time of Washington we have not seen any official communication from the First Magistrate of the United States, containing together with so much that was interesting and valuable, so little that was objectionable to a Statesman, or offensive to men of right feeling and good taste. As a political composition, the Message of the 8th ult. is characteristic of the qualities which have usually been ascribed to General Jackson. It is shrewd, decided and perfectly uncompromising, with more of that sort of dignity which belongs to moderation of language than some people would perhaps have anticipated from the veteran soldier. General Jackson does not shrink from a clear and straight forward representation of the bearings of any question which he is officially called upon to notice; nor from a voluntary discussion of one or more (relating chiefly to internal politics) of which the proposition might, by persons of a more indirect character, have been left as a task for others. We are sure that there is no good or intelligent Englishman who will not go his full half-way to meet the proffered friendship of the American citizen; and we believe, in the growing preparation amongst us, that none but madmen here, or in America, will wantonly risk an interruption of that precious harmony.

From the Liverpool Chronicle.
We confess, we have read this state paper with mingled feelings of sorrow, at the lamentable contrast presented by the situation of our own country; exultation, that there are twelve millions of Englishmen and descendants of Englishmen, in the enjoyment of all the blessings of a government proceeding from directed by, and ruling for, the people.

The people of America are happy, pious, and rich, without an aristocracy and without corn laws or game laws, without an established church and tithes, and without compromising any public interests at home, or sacrificing their station among other nations abroad.

PARIS, Jan. 12, Noon.—Two plans had been discussed to subjugate Algiers. The one was to land 5,000 men with the necessary material; the other to persuade the Viceroy of Egypt to place at our disposal a body of troops sufficient to besiege Algiers. In this case we should furnish the necessary material but we should avoid risking the health of our soldiers in a climate to which they are not accustomed. It is said that the last plan has been preferred, and that it was the sole object of the mission of M. Hulder, at Alexandria. That officer has just landed at Toulon—After having received the instructions of the Government, he will return to General Guilleminot at Constantinople, going by way of Alexandria, where he will have another conference with the Viceroy.

VIENNA, Dec. 23.—Though it becomes more and more probable that Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg may be the Sovereign of Greece, it is certain that before such a nomination takes place, Plenipotentiaries from the principal Courts of Europe will assemble in this capital to arrange this and other important matters. At the same time with a Greek Monarch the Legation of the several Cabinets will go to Greece in order to place it in a situation usual among friendly powers.
