CRIB,

From the Saturday Evening Post. A GHOST STORY.

The following incident occurred to a young artist, while travelling, not long since, and opening the shutters, pointed to a man through Germany. He relates it as follows: It in gupor the shed, which was on a level night at a hotel of a will-relate nor C. night at a hotel of a village near Gratz.—
The court yard was filled with travelling car- I expected oin home last evening, but findin the village that was not present ged. My horses had travelled far during the day, and I was invest so much fatigued that I would willingly have put up with indifferent accommodations; but he assured me that he he dalready given up his own chamber. Aff. however, 'said he, 'you are the latter had been indicated by the second travelled for the head of the horse of th

She twish her arms crossed upon her knees. She twish haggard and grey, and the light of the coals her countenance bute marks of dejections but there was a piercing, unquiet expression in her dark eye, which brought back forcibly my landlord's illusions to her powers of necromancy. She glauced at me as I entered; and, with a disappointed hir, point-arms of the arms and to the arms of the first counterforthly necessarily to the after of the first counterforthly necessarily to the state of th ed me to a seat on the other side of the fire, ship to the comfortable accommutation of the and resumed her posture and rocking motion, emigrants, is highly creditable to the Agent without making any inquiries as to the nature of my intrusion. I excused myself, however, telling her that the landlord of the hotel had informed me that she could accommodate me with a bed, and being much fatigued, should be glad to retire immediately. She got up, lighted a candle, and sitting is upon the table, pointed to a dish of vension paramon for an additional person, and de lining to take any thing, turned to her and asked if she had expected a stranger? She are swered rather undecidedly. No, and taking up the candle, led me up stairs to a little chamber, in the back part of the house; she then closed the shutters, and telling telling fronting the Market House.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Edinburgh Literary Journal. BELOVED! WHEN I AM DEAD. Belowed! when I am dead, Oh! do not weep for me in festal hours,
When they'the ellitering dance thy footsteps tread
on mimic flowers—

Nor by the blazing hearth.
When mingled voices awell in unless glee
Oh! chequer not that hour of holy mirth,
With thoughts of me!

Beloved! when I am dear!
Think not of me in bright and verdant bowers—
When the fall pride of summer's noon is shed,
On all its flowers:

When the rich rose's breath Is caught in every assiration, there:
When the Isburrnum's bloom illumineth
The glowing air!

For, 'mids' the festal glee,
By the glad hearth, and where the roses bloom,
No spirit, lare, would sympathize with thee
In kinderd gleom.

But, where the low sweet strains of winds and waters, blended with the sound of siliage echoes, burne from distant plains,
Are breathing round— Are creating round—

If there the feet should rove,

when twingle dimly falls on flower and tree,
Oh' then; my first—my last—my only love!

H-member me!

CONFESSIONS OF A TIPPLING PHILOSOPHER. Let us suppose, most indulgent and incomparable reader, that an interval of five years that passed. This arrangement will be inore convenient to me than a long and particular account of each individual twelve month—inaccount of each individual twelve month—indeed, I am persuaded that such an effort would be above my powers, for the pleasures of that blissful period are so blended in my taken memory into one harmonious whole, that I fear I should find it a vain and unprofitable task to endeavour to separate or define them. may, therefore, merely state to thee, that for five years I have been in London;—that as the my home has been an humble tavern called ed wi the Owl and Magpie; and that, though not sich, I have contrived to supply my wants my bi without being indebted to charity or compassion. My wants, indeed, were few. For hard food I had seldom any desire; from one storehouse my aliment was drawn, my body re-freshed to a pitch of superhuman strength, my mind invigorated to a degree of preterna-tural power. And this elysium could be en-tered,—this intellectual feast enjoyed for so maltry a sum as two pence per glass. On you paltry a sum as twopence per glass! Oh! ye who, wallowing in this world's riches, waste your time on the mastication of animal food, whose dreams are polluted by the oppressive substantiality of beef and mutton, how did lacorn the earth-born enjoyments of your inferior natures, as in the highest vain of phistrip structures. losophy and imagination, I let my spirit revel free, through the wide expanse of creation, and at the same time strengthened my corporeal energies by the inhaustion of a shilling's worth of gin! And herein is my existence, at m during that period, proved to have been hap-py, that my recollection does not furnish me with a single incident worthy of commemora-tion,—for the breaking in upon the Epicure-an quietude of my life of any event, pleasant protherwise which would have impressed itself so strongly upon my mind, as to be remem-bered after so considerable a lapse of time, would prove that my felicity had been deprived as it were of its totality, and that it had been broken for a season, at least, into frag-ments; a state of things inconsistent with a perfect, continuous, and uninterrupted philosophical calm. In this manner, for five years, was my time spent. I never experienced a lack of auditors, for the succession of guests in that house of entertainment was rapid and continual. My voice was raised upon all oc-casions, and on all occasions it was listened bled to with deference and respect. My learning to with deserence and respect. My learning was duly appreciated by the frequenters of the room where I usually sat; and gradually, a place became appropriated to own peculiar occupation, a pipe was reserved in the sanctity of its brownness, for me alone, and the auditory thronged, impatient for the exordium of my monologue, at a particular hour.—In the course of this monologue, my glass was frequently replenished by the admirers of my eloquence, my pipe was frequently re-filled eloquence, my pipe was frequently re-filled from the pouches of the by-standers, and fre-quently the last sounds which awakened a perception in my understanding, were the shouts of applause, or the ejaculations of wonder and admiration. Nor unmindful all this time was I of the cultivation of my intellect mot, indeed, according to the usual mode, by perusing musty books or dry dissertations, but by mixing equally and familiarly with my fellow men. Prom lips unlearned in the dectrine of the schools, I have heard the purest philosophy; and even over the coursest and commenest expressions of unlettered humanity; have I traced a film of delicacy, and manity, have I traced a film of defeacy and the refinement, which alleviated the vulgarity it the could not altogether conceal. But, imore than all, I sharpened my dialectic power by entering into contest with myself. I went through every question which suggested it.
