shot from the zenith into the abvest throwing athwart the waste a lurid glosm, lighting up on the terrors of its deep velleys or springing along its mauntains, and wreathing their lofty crests, fretted to a snow-live form.

The ship went on like a creature of destiny: despair had closed the lips and glazed the eye of every passenger, ind, as the lightning afforded opportunity, they might be seen, with cleuched hands, studing like statues, or rather spectress glaring, hale and ghastly. The black mass of clouds now ascended, boiling and rolling with endless involutions, and as a vast serpent, gathering up his dark folds for a combat, came in majestic gloom and fearful energy directly upon us. A report louder than artillery, and an appalling crash of timber, succeeded by a scream of

Two seamen were employed in the top act the moment, and they were cast down headlond!—one into the sear I shall never forget the moment of the beat of the search of the sea the expression of his livid face and bloodshot eye, seen by that dieadful light, as he pas-sed by me into the deep. The other, on the deck, close at my feet-and the expiring wretch clutched my ancle, in his agony, with grasp from which I struggled in vain to es cape. My own powers were inadequate, and assistance was not to be hoped for.

The fluid followed the mast, and, attractthe fluid toffewed the mast, and, attracted by a chain cable, passed out by the bows, but not harmlessly. There were many combustibles on board, such as turpentine, tar and cordage. Former perils were, therefore regarded as nought to these we felt were upon garded as nought to these we felt were upon us, when the maddening erry of 'Fire in the cable tier!' burst wildly from the crew. Exertions, stimulated by considerations of life and death, were used to extinguish the configuration, but they were vain. It could not be 'got ander.' The flame was rapidly coming aft, and the smoke drove in heavy sufficiently measure, along the deck. The shire sense of danger, plunged her bows madly intold, even of those who constantly reside at

A FRAGMENT.

But the dangers of the storm were subsected, as lost in the horror that now grappled and convalsed the iron hearts of medicaccust and to apart with ordinary perila, and to look upon the ocean in his wrath, with universal energies or sullen indifference. A SUBTERRANEAN VISIT.

Extenct of a letter to the editor of the Ladies' Journal of Literature and Science, Baltimore, dated.

PARIS, July 21, 1831.

"Will you not be a little surprised to hear that vesterday, in the full possession of life, health and my actua, quantum of reason—be it less or more—I actually visited in company with my husband, two lathes and several gentlemen—what place do you think? You will uever guess, and I may as well out with it at once—The lower regions! Stare not, ye lovers of the marvellous, should this assertion ever meet your view, but listen to the particulars of our subterranean visit. We assembled at about eight o'clock in the

we assembled at about eight o clock in the morning at the Royal Observatory, situated in St. James' suburbs, in the highest part of the city. The edifice was built, they tell me, by Louis XIV. in 1667, and takes its name from having been the residence of mathematicians, appointed by the king to make observations and improvements in extraorum. observations and improvements in astronomy. It is built of stone and so admirably arched that neither wood nor iron are used in the construction of the whole building. The height is about eighty or ninety feet, and at the top there is a beautiful platform which commands an excellent view of Paris and its environs. Trapdoors are placed perpendicularly one exactly above the other, in the dif-ferent floors, and when these are open, perand death, were used to extinguish the con-flagration, but they were vain. It could not be 'got ander.' The flame was rapidly co-above mentioned, which by the way leads ming aft, and the smoke drove in heavy suf-focating masses, along the deck. The ship; with her head wrapped in fire, pressed on through the sea, and, as if impelled by a sense of danger, plunged her bows maddy in-to the waves, rushing on, mountain high, to meet her; and as the fire eat into feer vitils, themselves any timble, from this edifice—can distinguish stars ve-focating masses, along the deck. We were a hundred leagues framland, and beyond the reach of all human aid. The discovery of a sail would only mock our, misery since success was supracticable, in such a sea, lashed into fury by such a tempeth.

We still went forward! On, on, like the wind! as $\frac{2}{2}$ we had been lost and condemned spirits, coursing the ocean on a steed of fame, girt about with a strange cleud of persons brine, and fiery amokes at the same moment accorded and frozen!

As a last, though desperate resort, it was determined to lower away the boats and condemned want the asserted alternative of death by burning. The confusion was indescribable? I called, I begged, prayed, cursed, and wept, in the very bitterness and desolution of my spirit. I might as well have invoked the storm, the brutes pushed off, and I was left orm, the brutes pushed off, and I was left a prisoner of the dead!

We have since learned that the illumination and refreshments were prepared on our account. We have also learned that many years ago it was inhabited by a famous gang of robbers, who infested the country; but of its origin, very little can be ascertained. It appears, however, that for the first building of Paris, it was necessary to dig the stone in the envirous, and as the city was cularged, it was insensibly built on try was cularged, it was insensibly built on these quarries, so that all you see without, is essentially wanting within, for the fundation is completely undermined."
