JANUARY.

A winter such as when hirds die
Lithe deep forests, and the fishes lie surfened in the translucentice, which makes
Even the mud and alime of the warm likes
A wrinkful clod, as bard as bricky and when
Among their children, conformable men
Gather about great hires, in lyet feel cold;
Alas/ then, for the homeless beggar old:
Sagtter.

The solar year commences in the ver depth of winter; and I open my record of its various aspects under that of its unmitigated I speak now as I intend to speak I describe the season not as it may be in this, or another year, but as it is in the average. December may be, I think, very justly styled the gloomiest; January the severest, and February the most cheerles-month in the year. In December the day month in the year. In December the day become shorter and shorter; a dense mass of vapour floats above us, wrapping the world in a constant and depressing gloom; and

It is a dismal time for the travellers and one of versers of wide and open heaths: and one of toil and danger to the shepherd in mountain ous tracts. There the snows fall in amazing quantities in the course of a few hours, and driven by the powerful winds of those lofty regions soon fill up the dells and glens to a vast depth, burying the flocks, and houses, too, in a brief space.

In some winters the sheep of extensive ranges of country, much cattle, and many of the inhabitants have perished beneath the snowdrifts. At the moment in which I am' writing, accounts from Scotland appear in the newspapers of a most tremendous snow-storm which, leaving the country southward of Alnwick and Greins green nearly free, has built of snow, sweeping across the country, even wast fall of snow, sweeping across the country, even waster.
