pass the barrier. By means of well directed throats with numberless bayonets, and the pressure of some dozens of feet, the poor brute was eften firly driven beneath his native mud. "Who once there, his enemies thalf choaked and salf spitted him, till at last they put an end to his miserable days in regions quite out of sight, and in a manner as inglorious as can will be imagined. For the poor denizens of this pool, indeed, it was the choice between-Scylla and Charybdis with a inglorious as can will be imagined. For the poor denizens of the pool, indeed, it was the choice between-Scyla and Charybdis with a vengeance; and I am half ashamed to acknowledge that the savage kind of delight with which we sood on the banks, and saw the distracted creatures rushing from one attack right into the laws of another. The Malays, in their extacy, beclared that the small fry from one side rushed down the throats of the big ones whom they may flying in the opposite direction. But this seems very questionable, though positively asserted by the enraptured natives, who redoubled their shouts as the plot thickened, and the two bodies of troops, marching from opposite quarters, drew within a hundred yards of each other. The intermediate space was now pretty well crowded with alligators, swimming about in the utmost terror; at times diving below, and and showing their noses, well plastered with mud, high above the surface of the dirty assertions of the direction of the direct her name. mud, high above the surface of the dirty mud, high above the surface of the dirty stream; or occasionally making a furious bolt in sheer despair right at the phalanx of Ma-lars. On these occasions half a dozen of the soldiers were often upset, and their pikes either broken or twisted out of their hands, to

The killed were none, but the wounded many-yet no man flinched in the least. perfection of the sport appeared consist in detaching a single alligator from the rest, surrounding and attacking him separately, and spearing him till he was almost dead. The Malays then, by main strength, forker him aloft over their heads, on the end of a do zen pikes, and by a sudden jerk pitched the nquered monster far on the shore. As the alligators are amphibious, they kept to the water no longer than they found they had an advanthat element; but as the period of the final melee approached, on the two columns of their enemy closing up, the monsters lost all discipline, floundered, and ploutered up the weedy banks, scuttling away to the right and left, helter skelter. "Sauve qui peut!" seemed to be the fatal watch-word for total rout. That prudent cry would no doubt have saved many of them, as it has saved many other vanquished forces, had not the Malays judiciously placed beforehand their reserve on each side of the river to receive the distract-ed fugitives, who, bathed in mud, and half dead with terror, but still in a prodigious fury, dashed off at right angles from the canal, in hopes of gaining the shelter of a swampy pool, overgrown with reeds and bulrushes, but which, alas for most of the poor beasts, they were never doomed to reach. The concluding battle between these retreating and desperate alligators and the Malays, of the reserve, was formidable enough. Indeed, had not the one payty been fresh, the other exhausted, one condident, the other broken in spirit, it is quity possible that the crocodiles might have wristed the pirates, as the Malays were called in every other part of the world but the East, where they are generally admitted to be as good a set of people as any of their neighbours.

It is needless to say, that while all this was going on, our gallant Admiral, Sir Samuel Hood, was a pretty busy spectator. His eagle eye glanced along the canal; and at a moment took in the whole purpose of the camof the reserve. was formidable enough.

ment took in the whole purpose of the cam-paign. As the war advanced, and sundry af-fairs of our posts took place, we could see his face flusting with delight. But when the first alligator was cast headlong and gasping at his feet, pieced with at least twenty pike woods, and blistled with half-a-dozen fragwounds, and bristled with half-a-dozen largements of these weapons fractured in the onslaught, the whole plain rung with his exclamation of boyisth delight. When the detachments closed in upon their prey, and every moment gave birth to some new produgy of valour, or laid a whole line of Malay soldiers moment gave birth to some new producy of valour, or laid a whole line of Melay soldiers prostrate op the muldy stream, like so many nine-pins, I very believe, that if none of his own people had been present, the admiral would have seized a pike himself, and jumped into the thickest of the fight, boots, sword, cocked hat, and all! As it was, he kept himself close to the hanks, and rivalled the best Malay amongst them in yelling and cheering on the forces to their duty.

This intensity of eagerness had well night proved rather awkward for his excellency's dignity, if not his safety: for, in spite of the repeated warnings of the English officers of the regiment, who knew from former, hunts what was sure to happen eventually, the admiral persisted in approaching the edge of the casal as the final act of the alligators' tragedy commenced. And as we, his poor officers, were, of course, obliged to follow our chief into any danger, a considerable party of us femd ourselves rather awkwardly placed between the reserves of Malays already spoken of said the canal, just as the grand race, took place at the close of the battle. If the infuncted crocodiles had only known what they were about, and had they brought their long sharp anonts, and still harder taile, into play, several of his majesty's officers might have chased to have found themselves in a scrape. As it was, we were extremsly near being wedged to between the animals' noses and his pikes and creases of the wild Malays. It was difficult, indeed, is say which of the two the seund, or provoked by the price of a pike, or mystified by the turbid nature of the stream, foundered backwards, and by etreating in the ground direction, broke through the first second, and even third line of Pikes. This, second, and even third line of Pikes. This, which would have been any thing but amusement to unpractised hands, was the perfection of sport to the delipited Malays. A double circle of soldiers as speedily formed round the wretched quatic who had presumed to pass the barner. By means of well directed thrusts with numberless bayoners, and the on the other; in a manner which excited both the mirth and the alarm of his company; brute was eften furly driven beneath his nature of course, we took good care rather
