THE DEATH FEAST.

We think those of our readers who have not before met with the following poein, will thank us for bringing them acceptanted with it. It is taken from a volume entitled Corbi-Law Rhymes, and the Village Patriarch.—The author, it appears from this preface, is a self-educated man, and one who has witnessed, in all probability experienced, some of that misery which he so foreibly and truly describes as pervading the labouring community of England. There is a simplicity and pathos in the prem which we have quoted, which cannot fail to touch a sympthetic cond in the bosom of the reader. Honest pride in the bosom of the reader. Honest pride and independence, coupled with deep and rennine affection, are fairly portraved; nor is the picture of endurance and suffering at all exaggerated; a's was remarked by a London reviewer, 'what this poem describes happeds, reriewer, 'wnat this is, unly in England. [Wash. Telegraph.

The birthday or the wedding day, Let happier mourners keep; To death my restal yows I pay,

Some gricfs the strongest soul may sliake, And I such gricf have hid: By brain is not—but they mistake, Who deem that I am mad.

And try in vain to weep.

My father died, my mother died, Four orphans poor were we; My brother John worked hard; and tried To smile on Jane and me.

But work grew scarce, while bread grew dear, And wages lessened too, For Irish horses were bilders here Our half-paid work to do.

Yet still he strove, with failing breath, And sinking check, to save Consumptive Jane from early death— Then joined her in the grave.

His watery hand in mine I took, And ki-sed him till he slept; O, still I see his dying look! He tried to smile, and wept!

I bought his coffin with my bed, My, gown bought earth and prayers I pawned my mother's ring for bread, I pawned my father's chair. My Bible yet remains to sell,

And yet insold shall be, But language fails my woes to tell— Even crumbs were scarce with me.

l sold poor Jane's gray linnet then, It cost a grost a year; I sold John's hen, and missed the hen When eggs were selling dear; For autumn nights seemed wintry cold, While seldom blazed my fire,

And eight times eight, no more I sold, When eggs were getting higher.

But still I glean the moor and heath;
I wash, they say, with skill;
And workhouse bread ne'er crossed my teeth, I'trust it never will.

But when the day on which John died, Returns with all its glopm, I seek kind friends, and beg with pride, A banquet for the tomb.

One friend, my Brother James, at least Comes then with me to dine:. Let others keep the Marriage feast, The Funeral feast is mine.

For then on him I fondly call,
And then he lives again!

Of death, and John and Jane. Even now, belfold! they look on me, Exulting from the skies, While Angels round them weep to see The tears gush from their eyes!

I cannot weep.—Why can I not?

Ny tears refuse to flow;

My feet are cold, my brain is hot—
In forer madness? No.

Thou amilest, and in accorn—but thou, Couldst thou forget the dead?
No common beggar curtaies now, And begs for hurial bread.

From the New York Republican. THE SILENT WITNESS.

In the wine street with Dandshafd lived a woning man danied Charleville, whose parents, though poor, managed to give him, an excellent education, such as Scotland alone affords to youth of aspiring talents, has without percuiary resources. He was at this time prosecuting the sindy of surgery, under the able and popular Dr. McDaniel, a gentleman whose heart and hand were always actively devoted to the cause of bemyolence. Charleville soon became acquainted with Louisa and very often happened to be strolling over and very often happened to be strolling over the country, just in time to meet her in her evening walks—Alas! those walks over ver-dant hills and shadow vales! they make said havoc in the hearts of two young and sheep-tible beings—who, Instead of admiring Wature's charms, commonly reserve all their admiration for one another. In short, the student and Louisa, soon became inseparable— to the terrible neglect of the dry pages of Sir Astley Cooper and Charles Bell.

This intimacy did not long escape the penetrating glance of Dundonald, who resolved at once to crush the passion in embryo. - So that one evening, as the lovers were about that one evening, as the lovers were about sallying forth from the paternal porch, the father suddenly advanced upon them, sternly ordered Louisa into the house, and asked Charleville what he meant by eternally darkening his door with his presence? This abrupt question and rude deportment, quite frightened the student from his propriety? —way, sir, (and he) the pleasure of Miss Dandonald's society—? No sir! I can see what you're driving at: but d—me if ayon a'nt inistaken—I have had too much trouble and mistay in making a forture, to hestow it and misery in making a fortune, to bestow it on a beggar.' This insulting remark called the blood into Charleville's cheek, and he was about replying, when the ruffin exclaimed: 'No words, sir! Keep away from Louisa—or, mark me, yiu'll rue it!'—with this, he re-entered the house, violently slamming the door after him.

Charleville returned to the office in the deepest state of dejection, and he now was aware, for the first time of the extent of his passion for the sweet gill of his heart. For several days he walked over his favourite haunts, in wain search for Louisa. One evening, after a long and fatiguing ramble, he entered the grave yard to find repose and shade under one of the bending willows which ornamented it. He came to a place where the grave digger was shovelling up some earth, in order to fill an adshafts had sunk several feet in the moist ground, and watched the motions of the sepul-chral laborer in his occupation. Occasionally a mouldering arm or thigh bone would appear, and at last a scull was tossed up with some and at last a scull was tossed up with some force and rolled to the feet of the student, who turned it over; when, in a protainence back of the car, he felt something which produced a grating sound, when the brass tip of his care rubbed against it. He stooped to examine it when to his horror and astonishment, he found a large nail driven through the cranium! He asked permission of the digger to carry this relic home, which was immediately granted. Without divalging the dreatful secret, he asked the man if he knew to whom that skull belonged: why yes, said he, that head has been lying here next Michaelmas 15 years. It belonged to the old wife of Squire Dundonald, who left him such a large fortune. I recollect her spike nail had been driven through the brain, which still clung in a monthlering mass around it. The Doctor afterwards gave the follow-

A Coroner's Inquest was held over the body—bot, although some suspicions were affort, nothing was proved—and the wretched victim was consigned to the grave without further examination. Duodonald and his na ramour lived together like man and wife. He canneared to be extremely fond of her—and appeared to be extremely found of her-and at her death(which occurred in giving birth to Louisa) he gave every sign of abject des-pair. The only being he has since been known

The Dr. and his student next consulted on some plan to solve the terrible mystery, during which Charleville found that his hopes of ing which Charleville found that his hopes of eventually possessing Louisa began to reviee. McDaniel was afraid to send Dundonald the skull, under the apprehension that he would detain, and afterwards obliterate all traces of

"What's your busines?' said he, sternly, and darting a look of ominous meaning.—
Sir, I have brought you news from a lady, to whom you are under some obligation.? No riddles, sir, but quick and be done! Charlewille, then in a firm and distinct voice, this him the result of his visit to the grave-vard, and the dreadful suspicion which the skull had excited in his mind. Had a thinder-both suddenly fallen at his feet, he could not have been more terror-stricken than at this discovery; his whole frame shaddered with a converging more more more terror-stricken than at this discovery; his whole frame shaddered with a converging more more more more more than at this discovery; his whole frame shaddered with a converging his properties of the first idea was to grasp Charleville by the throat. One moment of reflection, however, brought him to his habitual cunning and with a mighty effort he bore down the denon that was rising within him. He immediately assumed the utmost serenity of aspect, attempted to largh at the suspicions of ville, then in a firm and distinct voice, taid pect, attempted to laugh at the suspicions of i pect, attempted to laugh at the suspicions of the student, and expressed a wish to see the dreadful skull. Ite finished by saying, that he had lately been thinking about Louisa's attachment for him, which he had too long opposed—that he found his harsh conduct to her had preved upon her health, and he was now resolved to gratify them both. At the same time he humbly begged his pardon for his past treatment, and asked him to sup that very evening with his intended bride—and harkee. Charley, the exclaimed, as he left him) don't forget that nailed skull you were talking a forget that nailed skull you were talking a-bout."

The exquisite delight which this unexpected change caused in our student, removed for the moment, all his unfavourable impressions, and he returned to the Doctor to relate the result of his interview. M. Daniel, however, knew the mandon well, to place the slightest confidence in his professions. He, therefore, left him such a large fortune. I recollect her funeral, as it was only yesterday—Oh! she was a fine old lady, so kind and so gentle!— there was not a dry eye present but that of her husband. This observation strengthened & suspicions he had already formed of a crime like that committed by Jael on Siscra, mentioned in the Scriptures. He took the skull to the office, and after binding Dr. M Daniel to secrecy, at Jeast for the present, he showed it to him. They examined the crain soon introduced. ly buttened up his cost, and returned the class to the servant. All this was done in less time than I have taken to record it. After a few: minutes talk, he affected to be drowsy; attd, applegizing to Louisa for his breach of courtesy, he requested permission to lie down. He was conducted to a retired to lie down. He was conducted to a retired room opening into the hall, where he was left to his awful meditations. He soon pretended to be asheep, and smored loudly—In a few minutes he heard the approach of footsteps. The door was slowly opened, and through his half-closed eyes, he perceived Dundonald cautiously approaching his couch on tip-toe.—The miscreant benthis knee with the intention of messing upon the breast of his x-step and cventually possessing Louisa began to revive. M Daniel was afraid to soul Dandonald the skull, under the apprehension that he would detain, and afterwards obliterate all traces of this important witness—and he hesitated about trusting the young man alone with him, for fear of violence. Charleville, however, overcame this objection, by going armed with a brace of pistols. He went to the house, and asked to speak to the Squire as he was generally called. The servant had received orders not to adout him; but as he was extremely ungent, he took him to a private cabinet, and called his master down.

to relate. He made his will, and after leaving handsome legacies to his wife's relations, he bequeathed the balance of his property to Louisa, with the hope, (as he expressed it) that she would bestow her hand upon the worthy youth she so fondly loved.? This excel lent pair came every day to see him in his gloomy cell, soothed his melancholy reflections by their assiduous attentions, and suggesting to his mind those sweet consolations which religion alone can bestow.

At length the day of trial came on; the sheriff and officers went to his cell to bring him forth—but they found the bed and floor de-luged with blood, and the criminal a stiffened corpse! It appeared on examination, that he had opened the large artery of his thigh—and he no doubt expired almost instantaneously. A few months after this fatal occurrence, Louisa disposed of all her property in the town, and retired to a charming cottage she had purchased at Tarbet near the sublime and picturesque scenery of Loch Lomond. Here she was shortly afterwards joined by Charleville, who had in the interim obtained his degree at

It is also part cutarly mentioned in the last and most thrilling tale of the 'Country Curate'—in which the dreadful security which it possesses over the common methods of assassination, is apoken of in a manner which might whisper horrid temptations to men of 'lawless and uncertain thoughts.'
