At half-past nine P. M. the attack was re ewed with much fury, and the assailants adranced up to our batteries, and obtained temperary possession of a covered way forming the communication between the Pastelleiro and a new redoubt to its right, which latter they surrounded, but in the end their success was no greater than on the previous occasion, as they were shortly afterwards again com-pelled to retire to their lines, leaving the field streyed with dead.

On this occasion the enemy's cavalry was brought into action for no other purpose that can be gussed at but to animate their infantry; the former were however, cut to pieces, a troop of them actually attacked the last men-issed redoubt, and when I visited the spot in the afterneon, the carcases of eleven horses were lying in its front, two of which were not uz yards distant from the fosse of the works.

The altempts upon this part of the lines having proved unsuccessful, the enemy determined to try his luck in the direction of Box. Vin, between which battery and the river Deno they showed themselves in great num-bers, and rapidly drovo in our outline pickets.
