Were I permitted to follow my inclination I might perhaps, conclude my address with observations calculated to throw a light on the political embarrassments of one part of the world, and their influences on the foreign relations of our country .- But there are circumstances which are rendered worse by being made the subject of remark. Who then will be so presumptous as to attempt to draw aside a veil which will not bear to be touched, and which it may be salutary to respect; and how can I forget that this is not one of those specks of rare good fortune extelled by the most problem Roman historians, when people are at liberty to feel what they will and to say what they feel.
