

Pieces must be sewed together at the bottom, and connected at the top by two small straps and buckles, so as to be let out or taken up at will. The lower part must be so shaped as to fit the throat of the horse. A strap passes from the bottom of the sweater between the legs to the girth by means of which it is kept in place. The strap should not be too tight, lest it might incline a bawling horse to stop, when ascending a hill; and the buckle at the end near the girth, if it chafe may be covered, the leather should be tolerably stout upper, rendered pliant by the occasional application of tallow to the outside. The inner side should be kept clean and smooth. The sweater is in fact a sheath to the shoulders, and the collar rests on it instead of the skin of the animal.

FOREIGN.

LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM EUROPE.

On Thursday morning the packet ship Silas Richards, Captain Baraley, arrived at New York from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 24th of May. By this arrival the editors of the Commercial Advertiser have received numerous files of London papers to the 23d May, and Liverpool to the 24th, both inclusive.

DEATH OF LAFAYETTE.

The first intimation that attracted our attention, and before the tidings of the fact had reached us by rumour, was the death of the last surviving General of the glorious army of the American Revolution—the immortal LAFAYETTE! The accounts of his indisposition reaching us from time to time for so very long past, together with his great age, had indeed prepared us for this event. Still it will carry sadness to every American heart. We have given ample details of this melancholy event below. The English journals, of all parties seem vying with each other to do the justice of the deceased patriot's character and renown. He died 20th of May. His funeral was to be celebrated on the 21st ultimo. The papers of the 21st—the day after his decease—were chiefly filled with remarks and particulars relative to his death. With few exceptions only—and these the warmest advocates of the fallen cause of liberty—the French papers unite in bearing testimony to the eminent political qualities and private virtues of the departed patriot.

The death of General Lafayette is one of those events which cannot take place without striking home to a nation's heart with that force of mighty solemnity which is remembered once and forever. No corner of the earth but will be affected by the tidings. The light of his life and the promise of his public opinion, that was perhaps ever occupied by a mortal—except by association with the birth and progress of the grand events which have marked this age in an unapproachable advance of every order, and which have given a new tone to the political aspect of the world—the death of the purest and most consistent republican of his time—will startle with the contrast of their own degeneracy the prodigious anarchy of France, and the tottering idols of exploded despotism will exult in the removal for ever from the scene of life, of the incorruptible patriot—the sway of whose principles made them shudder and tremble on their lofty thrones.

And America! how will the voice of universal sadness ring from her thousand hills, now that the last of the memorable men who guided her arm in the dark hour of her revolutionary struggle, is no more! The friend of her Washington—the last link that bound his living memory with her present greatness—the first in her affections—the first in her gratitude—whose memory will live last in her remembrance. Lafayette! thou great and good! the time will never come when the collection of thy virtues and thy services will be effaced from the heart of the country, or thy adoration, and to which thy exertions so greatly contributed to give rank among the nations of the earth.

This is not the time, and not the place, to give that view of Lafayette's character to which he is entitled. What sentiments of political life have been his. He commenced his career when the light of the Liberty of France was still bright upon the land. Actuated by a impulses of his generous enthusiasm, he enlisted his energies, in that cause of liberty which attained a vigorous manhood in America, and stretching across the wide Atlantic, soon grew to a giant might in his native land. The Royal Ship of France went down? The feudal rule of a thousand years was supplanted by the genius of Revolution, which, drunk with licence, and mad with new found power, stalked on from desolation to desolation—subverting all, controlling all, destroying all,—until mankind grew sick with horror, and turned frighted from the sight.

But Lafayette had no part with its blood, its terrors or its crime—his voice was heard above the storm—the pure serenity of his principles prevailed at last, and for a moment France seemed to have settled into the grandeur and dignity of regulated freedom. Then came the iron sway of a sterner but more imposing despotism. Napoleon went on from conquest to conquest—gathering glory from successive victories—and, concentrating the Nation's energy with his own fame and power, till the bubble burst, and he fell, crushed beneath the massive weight of the edifice he had created. Lafayette never bowed down to the splendid idol. When the world went wild with adoration,—aloof and in retirement, the republican General, unawed, unflinching, and unimpaired, preserved his consistency and his principles. The Bourbons, supported by the bayonets of the Holy Alliance, returned to the throne which mocked their imbecility. The patriot of 1787 was true to himself in 1814—He had no common cause with men whose premises were fallacious—whose consequence was an incubus on the land. And in the hundred days, still faithful to the guiding principles of his life, he distrusted the suspicious love for constitutions, when found in the despot master of the Confederation of the Rhine.

When the dynasty of Napoleon was crushed by the arm of England never to rise, on the plains of Waterloo—the uneducated pureness, and far-reaching wisdom of Lafayette saved the nation from the tremendous horrors of a protracted struggle which the defeated and desperate monarch could have created.

For fifteen years, the chafed and uneasy nation again endured the Bourbon sway. Lafayette, throughout, distrusted them—and when with madness weak as it was wicked, they attempted in 1829, to wield the sceptre of Louis the Fourteenth—they fell, in an instant, beneath the fearful reaction they had created.

The all-powerful character and spotless integrity of Lafayette was interposed to save the Nation. A France was in his hands. With the ease of instant determination he had stepped into the vacant throne—but he preferred the greatness of saving his country to the glory of ruling it.

His conduct then, completed his renown, and gained him a distinction of pure and unqualified fame which no public character ever before attained. From that time he remained the idol of his country and the wonder of the world—the man whose character and whose consistency alone preserved the nation.

As acknowledged by all to be the man who held the jarring despotisms of Europe and of the earth in his hand—a knowledge by all, and proved, by events, to have been the only man existing who could not abuse his trust, who could not be tempted by his situation.

Such, in a few words, was Lafayette—the morning star of our Revolution, and the guiding light of another—he lived to see his principles triumph and his glory complete—by saving his country at the most tremendous crisis of its whole history—and has gone down to the grave with an honour, a celebrity and a purity of reputation rarely if ever before attained by any public character.

The particulars of this melancholy event, says the Journal of Commerce, are contained in the annexed letter from our correspondent.

Lafayette is no more!—The brave, the noble, the generous, the patriotic hero—died on the morning of the 20th, at a quarter before five o'clock. His illness was at first exceedingly slight, and no one calculated upon the lamentable result. He followed the remains of DuRoi to the grave, and it is believed that he then caught a cold, which fixing upon his lungs, has caused his dissolution. Like Canizales, who suffered in the same way, after attending the funeral of the Duke of York, Lafayette owed his death to an attendance at the same. He was in his seventy-seventh year, having been born on the 6th of September, 1757. He was attended by Drs. Andral, Marjolin, Chiquet, and several other eminent medical characters, who up to the 18th gave as their opinion, that their illustrious patient would recover.

On the 19th five of them issued a bulletin describing his state, and anticipating his recovery. But in the course of the night a most material change took place, his breathing became very difficult, and when an effort was making to apply a blister to his chest, he suddenly expired, it would be of no avail, and General Lafayette. On the 19th considerable sensation was experienced in the Chamber of Deputies, at the prospect of the dissolution of their venerable colleague, and M. Dupin, of the course of the morning thus addressed the Chamber.—According to a wish expressed by the Chamber will authorize me to send, in my name, to make enquiries relative to the health of our illustrious colleague—General Lafayette. (Numerous cries of 'yes' 'yes') I have already, said the President, sent in my own name.

This distinguished compliment is generally reserved for members of the Royal Family, and therefore can be the more appreciation when applied to the departed. The following was the reply to the message of the Chamber.—Mr. President—All my family feel grateful for the interest the Chamber has so kindly taken in my father's health. I have the satisfaction to inform you that there is a slight improvement at this situation. Have the kindness, Mr. President, to present the homage of our respectful gratitude to the Chamber—and accept for yourself the assurance of my very high consideration. (Signed.)

GEORGE LAFAYETTE.

This note was loudly cheered by nearly every member in the Chamber, but, unappreciated, this joy was but of short duration, for on the next day the President thus announced the death of his colleague—I have the affliction of announcing to the Chamber, the decease of the Honourable General Lafayette. He died this morning at five o'clock. I shall now proceed to draw the names of the members who shall attend his funeral, but I have no doubt but a great number of his colleagues will consider it a duty to accompany his remains. Mr. Dupin was very much affected while addressing the Chamber, and so were several of its members. His illustrious friend Mr. Francois Delessert moved that the President should be instructed to write a letter to the General's family, to express the profound grief felt by the Chamber for the great loss his colleagues and the entire of France had experienced.

This was instantly acceded to, and the Chamber suspended its proceedings for an hour, so that the letter of condolence should be immediately written. A Council was held at the Thuilleries soon after his demise, for the purpose of agreeing as to the necessity of calling out the National Guard, and permitting them to attend the funeral of their departed chief. It is not yet known what the intentions of the Government are, but it is believed that they will not in any way interfere. One account that I have seen, states that he will have a public funeral, and that the two sons of Louis Philippe will be ordered to attend as chief mourners. If so, what a mockery will this be! That Monarch who could insult, and attempt to disgrace Lafayette during his lifetime, is now amongst the most afflicted at his death, and would have us believe that his tears are proofs of his sincerity. I am not so credulous, for I firmly conceive those tears—to be tears of joy. Louis Philippe always dreaded Lafayette, and was afraid of the immense power which the veteran had always at command. He is rejected as much if not more so, than he was when he heard of the demise of young Napoleon. He now imagines that two powerful factions will be annihilated—that of the empire, in the death of the Duke of Reichstadt, that of the Republic, in the decease of Lafayette.

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE.

Paris, Tuesday, (May 20.) 4 o'clock, P. M. General Lafayette died this morning at five o'clock. The close of his earthly career is an event which will be duly recorded in the history of France. During the last 13 years of his life he was the only individual alive who had taken a leading part and figured in a conspicuous manner, in the events of the first revolution. His political career is so well known that it would be hardly necessary to enter into any thing like an account of his life. Many persons will rejoice at his death, some on account of what they were pleased to call his interference in the order to which he belonged; by but others, because they looked upon the moral influence of his name to be such, that the existence of the Government, which he so powerfully constituted, in raising, depended greatly, up to the last day of his life, on his will.

General Lafayette never sought to use against the present Government the power which he well knew to be at his command. He had certainly looked for the quarrel of different systems of government, but that which is now present. He had, in fact, persuaded himself that a monarchy, surrounded by republican institutions, which, of all forms of Government, appeared to him the best adapted to the political temper of the French, could only be assured to France by being entrusted to a man like Louis Philippe, who happily combined a descent from royal blood with principles of a very republican kind, and whom many years of adversity had brought to a continued contact with all classes of men, and qualified, in a peculiar manner, to fill truly a republican throne. Lafayette had approved of the gradual deviation, and finally to the total separation from the principles which monarchy was contained in France in the person of Louis Philippe; but he contented himself with expressing on all suitable occasions his disapprobation of that course, without ever uttering a word or committing an act which could be construed into a rebellious appeal to the passions of the many whom that course had disaffected in a much greater degree than himself.

Up to his last hour he retained the fullest possession of his mental faculties. The infirmities of age had only visited his physical frame. But he and his intimate friends had perceived many months ago that he had begun to sink. The decay of nature, however, was more rapid with him than it had threatened when its first decided symptoms became visible. His age was 77. You will perceive that the Chamber of Deputies paid him yesterday the distinguished compliment of sending in its name to inquire after the state of his health.

Paris, May 20.—In simply announcing to you the demise of General Lafayette, I believe that I do all in my power to give interest to the statement. The venerable patriot and heroic soldier was in the 77th year of his age, having been born on the 6th of Sept., 1757. He expired at his house in the rue d'Anjou this morning, a few minutes before 5 o'clock.

Had this event occurred 6 weeks earlier, it might, and I think would, have been followed by others of very serious import. The recollection that General Lafayette had incurred the local attack which eventually terminated in his death, by following on foot to the cemetery of Pere La Chaise the remains of M. DuRoi (a patriot himself) and the nephew of our still more celebrated Dupont de l'Eure; and the remembrance that the life of M. DuRoi had been taken in a duel by the champion, (I suppose I must call him) of the Court, General Bugeaud, would have provoked more of public indignation than it can or will now occasion. A sentiment of grief will now supersede that of rage. The revolt, or whatever other name shall be given to the affair of the 15th and 14th of April last in Paris—the insurrection at Lyons—the attempts of a similar kind elsewhere—the massacres, and the innumerable arrests that accompanied and have succeeded to them—the trials of the prisoners now impending—the granting of all the real demands of Government by the Chamber of Deputies—and the tone of despair taken by the opposition—have all contributed to throw a damp on the spirits of the people, of whom, with all his weakness, Lafayette was the idol. The consequence will be, that his remains will now be interred with pomp certainly, but unaccompanied by any movement of an insurrectionary character.

King Louis Philippe is unquestionably the spoiled child of fortune. Death seems to strike with peculiar energy for him, and even the frailties of human nature appear to develop themselves but to serve and promote his purposes. Napoleon the Second, Lamarque, and Lafayette, are numbered with the dead. The empire and the republic have succumbed with them. The cause of Henry IV. was lost by the occurrence at the Chateau de Blaye.

The funeral of General Lafayette will be a splendid—it will be an interesting—even a touching spectacle, but it will not be productive of great consequences. Orations—numerous orations will be pronounced over his grave ere the earth cover him, but none of them in the spirit of Antony. Grief will have way—garlands of flowers will rise in pyramids over the grave of his rest, and Lafayette will repose among the great and the unfortunate already entombed in the square of Massena, (including Ney, Davoust, Massena, Lefebvre, Suchet, St. Cyr, &c.) and the people will disperse, and the fate of France will remain for some time longer undecided. Peace to his manes.

EXPRESS FROM PARIS.

Times Office, May 23, 6 o'clock, A. M. The Paris papers of Wednesday, which we have received, are, as might have been expected, chiefly filled with remarks and particulars relative to the death of General Lafayette. With few exceptions, they all agree in bearing testimony to the many eminent political qualities and private virtues of the departed patriot. It is hardly necessary to say that the two exceptions are to be found among the journals which still think it worth while to advocate the fallen cause of legitimacy. The General's funeral was to take place on Thursday morning, 22d. The Chamber of Deputies had exhausted on Tuesday the business brought before it, and therefore adjourned sine die. A great number of members had already taken passports to repair to their homes; so that there is every appearance that when the next Chamber meeting will be for the purpose of hearing either the king's speech or his proclamation for his dissolution.

The death of GENERAL LAFAYETTE, which becomes our duty to announce to our readers, is an event which will produce, throughout the whole of this country, an universal sensation for the loss of a friend so old, so true and dear, mingled with sincere sympathy for the country and the kindred by whom the loss of him will be more immediately and keenly felt.

The two Houses of Congress and the Executive of the United States, the moment the news was received, took measures preparatory to paying the national honours due to his memory. In Congress, a numerous joint committee of both Houses, has been raised, at the head of which is the distinguished Ex-President, Mr. Adams, to report the measures proper to carry this purpose into effect.

CONGRESS.

IN SENATE. Saturday, June 21.

A Message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Franklin, their Clerk, stating that the House had passed a joint resolution providing for a joint committee to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it was proper for Congress to manifest the deep sensibility of the nation on the event of the decease of General Lafayette. Mr. Webster said, that he had prepared a resolution, which, as it happened, was in precisely the same words as that which he presented to the House. He should have presented it as soon as the journal was read, but it not being intimated to him that a communication would be made to Congress on this interesting occasion, by the President, in consequence of that intimation, he had forbore, for the moment, to propose the resolution; but, as the House had so promptly moved in the business, he rose to move the Senate concur in the resolution, and appoint a Committee on its part.

The motion having been agreed to—Mr. Poindexter suggested that the Committee consist of nine members. Mr. Forsyth named thirteen, the number of the old States, as the most appropriate. This last number was agreed to, and, on motion of Mr. Chambers, the committee was appointed by the chair.

A Message was received from the President of the U. States, by Mr. Duffison, his Secretary, communicating the afflicting intelligence of the death of the illustrious Lafayette, and stating that he had issued orders to have the appropriate honours paid to the memory of the deceased by the Army and Navy of the United States, which were ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on the subject.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After the reading of the Journal—Mr. J. Q. Adams rose to state that, since the last adjournment of the House, intelligence had been received of the decease of a citizen which had filled the hearts of civilized man. He had not time to prepare a resolution fitting such an occasion, but he presumed it would be obvious to every person that it was an occurrence peculiarly becoming the Congress of the United States to adopt some suitable measure to express their deep sense they entertained of the misfortune involved in the decease of one of the eminent benefactors of the age and of mankind. It occurred to him that such a measure should be discharged in a manner subservient to the dignity of the Representatives of the People and States of this Union, and the merits of him to whose memory tribute should be paid. This he supposed could be, in the form of a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress. He would therefore, submit a motion that a committee should be appointed to consider in what manner a tribute of affection and respect may be presented by the Congress of the United States expressive of the sensibility of the nation, to the event of the decease, and of their affection for the memory of the illustrious General LAFAYETTE.

Mr. Adams then offered the following resolutions: Resolved, That a Committee of the House be appointed on the part of this House to such Committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation on the decease of General LAFAYETTE.

Mr. Archer rose to suggest that the number to be appointed on the Committee should be filled up with fifteen members. Mr. J. Q. Adams would assent to any number the House might think proper to appoint. Mr. Watmough suggested the number thirteen.

Mr. Cambresing proposed that the Committee should consist of one member from every State in the Union. Mr. E. Whittlessey expressed his hope that every State would be permitted to be represented on the Committee in paying its tribute of respect.

After some further verbal modifications, the suggestion of Mr. Wayne, on the suggestion of Mr. Wayne, on the motion of Mr. Hubbard, ordered to consist of twenty-four.

The following gentlemen were appointed to compose the said committee: From Massachusetts—JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Chairman; Rufus McInture, From Maine—Henry Hubbard, From New Hampshire—Henry Hubbard, From Rhode Island—Tristram Barber, From Connecticut—Nathan Barber, From Vermont—Nathan Allen, From New York—James Parker, From New Jersey—C. C. Condit, From Pennsylvania—Henry A. Muhlenberg, From Delaware—John J. Miligan, From Maryland—Isaac Wickham, From Virginia—William S. Archer, From N. Carolina—Lewis Williams, From S. Carolina—Henry L. Pinckney, From Georgia—Richard M. Johnson, From Kentucky—James M. Warrick, From Tennessee—John Blair, From Ohio—Elisha Whitwell, From Louisiana—Philonen Inaud, From Indiana—John Carr, From Mississippi—Henry Caggs, From Illinois—Joseph Duran, From Alabama—John Murphy, From Missouri—William H.
