When the doors were burst open, the fawn the constant companion of one of the po nies, ran into the street-but missing its mate and alarmed, probably, by the noise and confu shared the fate of its fellows. In the meantime the flames were doing their work of destruction most effectually, in other parts of the building. The scenery, decorations and platforms, used in the representation of Mazeppa, and the cost ly wardrobe of the company were consumed al nost in an instant, and in less than an hour no a vestige of the building was left but its black. ened walls. The front of the house fell out, soon after day-light, with a tremendous crash carrying, in the fall, every thing in its way.—

Fortunately no lives were lost. Mr. Cooke's loss is not only enormous, but entirely irreparable. His stud of horses, and his collection of the other attendants upon a circus company had, we are credibly informed no superior in the world. Forty of the persons attached to the company belong, either nearly or remotely, to Mr. Cooke's family. All o he members of his corps were distinguished for the correctness of their moral conduct, and for the propriety of their deportment in society .-

calamity excites the unreserved sympathy of all our citizens, upon whom their unobtrusive merits had already made a deeply favourable impression. We have heard the loss estimated at $80 000, and this, we should think, rather within than beyond the truth -Chron.
