That which at other periods of the year, nature herself, with her various bounties palliates, now by the dispensations of Providence has become nore and more rigorous. It would seem as if the practice of those virtues which christianity most positively enjoins, is furnished by the course of nature, at stated periods, with frequent and abundant opportunities of exercise.
The great Father of the Universe foresaw that the commands of his inspired writers were not only just as rales of conduct, but that the condition of man, and the order of his providence, often made their observance most indispensible.

And who does not feel, when day by day he pours out his gratitude to Heaven for the blessings of food and raiment, when he looks upon his sparkling hearth and catches the spirit of content from a cheerful and happy circle of friends, that a persevering interest in the condition and happiness of his fellow creatures is indispensable to the full enjoyment of the bounties conferred on him?
