The mother's hise consoles the habe.
That weeps in helpless grief.
And for the troubles of the child And for the troubles of the child Brings smiles of sweet relief; Yet still those quickly-banished tears Are like the April rais; Beneath the polished lids they swell, And back they come again.

The friend hoside his sorrowing friend, With sympathy sincere,
Divides the pang, returns the sigh,
And stays the bitter tear;
Yet o'er the fountain of the heart And forth they gush again.

Though love and friendship's hallowed force. May quell the tides of wos, Each passing hour retains the power. To bid their waters flow:
But they who take a bleese, I flight. Alove the realms of pain,
Whose tears the hand of God hath dried, Shall never weep again.
