Sneers at McClellan.

Seward's home organ, the Auburn Advertiser, announces that "the army of the Potomac has, during the last week, made an advance of, as near as we can calculate, two and a half inches. At this rate of speed, we have ascertained from very careful computation, that it will reach Centreville some time in the month of December in the last year of the Millennium."

The people must come forward to the defense of McClellan, Haleck, Sherman, and other faithful officers to whom is confided the direction of the army, lest they should be overthrown and borne down by the Abolition cohorts who now assail them with fierce vituperation or charges reflecting on their competency. Masked batteries are now opened upon them from the whole gang of editors in control of the radical press. To be sure, the assailants are now for the most part acting under restraint—very generally doing their work through the instrumentality of anonymous communications, pamphlets, &c., but if permitted to pursue their course with impunity, will soon throw off all disguise and proclaim openly their revolutionary designs. This should be stopped peremptorily, unless we are prepared to encounter a worse evil than has yet come upon us.—Journal of Commerce.
