THE SOUTH

That never recent to fly;
Ther wind about our forms at noors,
They woo us lat the shade,
When panting, feder the summer's heats,
We seek the welculate glade;
They win us with a bong of love,
They cheer us with a dream
That gilds our raising thoughts of life

They cheer us Mith a dream
That gilds our pessing thoughts of life
As smilght does the stream;
And well would they persuade us now,
In moments all too dear,
That, though our hearts may aisful be,
We have our Elica here. Ah, well has lavish Nature,

Within her metron glance; tur skies look down in tender May claim no doffer hue: And, let them sing of fruits of Spale, And let them Boatt the flower

Is a glory in courieve.
But the mides of the South will rule
When all the rest are nigh.

Around the college pale, And, correct trught by hunter s aim, The rabbit do so the vale, Each boon of kindly Nature Herdula, her blooms, her flowers, And, more than all, the maidens fair,

Are still in rich perfection,
As our fathers found them first,
But our sons are reside now no more,
And all this land is cursed. Wild thoughts are in our bosque,

And a savage discontent:
We love no more the life we led.
The music, nor the went:
The merry dance delights us not, The muse, not like went:
The merry danced delights us not,
As in that better time,
When off in happy bands we met
With spirits like our clime.
And all the goodal leveliness And ell the spile is gone, That linked the spirits of our youth,

And made due privade one.

They smile no more together
As in that carly day.

Our maidens sight in functions

Who one work dwars gaw;

And though our sides are bright. Ah, me I the thought is sad I feel, We shall never smile again.
