[PUBLISHED BY REQUEST.] The Maidens Story.

One cold, dark, cheerless wintry night, One Cold, dark, encertess wanty near Cathered around a fire bright. Five maidens old—we would divine The youngest then was thirty-nine; The eldest usid, and most schate, Had numbered all of forty eight; Each maid her knitting had in hand Each murden's face was bright and bland : Bight basely their fingers flew, Right merrily their tongues run too. At length one dropped her worsted ball, And rose to cutch it, maidens all;

I loved him most devotedly, For L in I could have died. He ever was most chaptent, When speaking of the hoto

His tened, and my sky seemed hight My bright son eat it gloom For fill disease had faid his hand On him theid so dear. And ere k month had passed away, They hid him on his bier. I wateled him till his spirit f'ed

Its tenement of city; I cared not for the squeering lip, Or what the world might say Since flien my hand has oft been sought, I deem it sin to yield a han I Where Leart can never go. Each maid wiped something from her eye-Each maid drew something like a righ; And then mother maid began Her narrative, and thus it ran:

"Man is deceifful, and love can dicay— This I had proven in life's early day; Never a moden more tracting than I. Ere fals hood of man had taught me to a gh. One yowed that he loved; I listened, believed; He seemed most sincer, and I was deceived; He asked for the heart which he has alused, He sudd for my hand, and it was not refused.

and Eyes
Spool Cotton, Spool Silk, Knitting Cotton
Such weakness as tears—such folly as love.
Since then I have yielded no faith unto man,
Have hated the sea, and blame me who can." The maiden parsed None wondered now Related what we write ! clow

"Ere yet in childhood's early day, Those careless days of mirth were gone, I saw that man, when dealing with our sea Oft sought but to deceive, to wrong. saw that many, honest deemed With us, to seek our love, and then Boast of their triumph o'er the heart-To win, without quite asking for the heart Which they said would be refused. I had a sister once. Poor thing ! She gave her hand, without a sigh, To one she deemed most excellent; Heart-broken, she came home to die.

If that he appeared to be; he said that woman, if she wed at all, Had care and little liberty. And as I had enough of wealth
To banish want while life should last,
I said I would not yield to man the heart
Or hand, which he might scorn at last. Many have urged me to believe

She told me man but seldom proved

But I had no desire to risk So ladies I am single still, To say that I am happier far than most Who shudder at the name 'old maid.' None ventured to gainsay a word, And so another tale was heard.

"A beauty and a village pet,
I said I will not marry yet,
But will a little while coquet;
And so
I flirted with each beau awhile;
On no one would frown, op one would
But sought to hold them all the while,
Each beau.
A beauty and a village tells, I thought
Should surely marry well. Should surely marry well, and which to take I could not tell,

As better offers soon might come,
I thought I would not change my bome,
And would give answers unto none
But no. Years swiftly fled, and beauty too,

And lovers they were very few,
And so,
Extremely plain abd poor, that I
To marry would not even try,
And now an old maid I shall die—

Heigh to ! !" The listeners smiles, and now began The voungest of that maiden band. "Well, Indies, as Flive, I never had An offer in my life,
Nay, do not stare, each word I speak is truth;
Am I to blame, then, I am not a wife?
My carlier days wire spent on bed of pain,
And when my sickness fled,
It left me almost tripled, and none wished
To ask a sicknest one like me to wid. Har there was who seemed to love me well-they as a brother;

For me he gathered flowers, and read long tales;
He is married now; I never loved another. And ladies, I your histories have heard, And think they plainly show You know no more of happiness than I, Who never had a beau !" The maiden ceased. Now all agreed That they from many cares were freed; And were contented with it eir lot, should any say that they were not. Such standarous words should be resented,
For certainly they were contented.

Drinking.

Since my early childhood, the subject of dissipation has caused me to ponder whenever it has come before my mind, either from steing some one under the influence of intoxication. or from being present when the subject was under discussion. The thing I most wonder at, in connection with the subject, is the fact that though all agree that it is perfectly terrible to behold this horror and its effects, none seem inclined to take up the ten, and dir awar as if they were trying to eradicate the vile and loathsome pestilence that it is from our midst. until the public taind is thoroughly awakened to the importance that a due consideration of this matter is to society—our fathers, our sons, and our brothers. Is it not perfectly awful to think of the number of agencies that the devihas upon the fate of our bright and beantiful land in the shape of goog-chops and grocerics. whose who'e support is the sale of hell fire by the pint or drink? And how perfectly the inlividuals who keep these dreadful places verify the old saving, ""that the deril takes care of his own." for how often we see characters who begin this trade, of purchasing souls for satan, with the smallest imaginable stock-in-trade perhaps a five gallon runlet of keen edge, but dozen common glasses, a pack of cards, and a I tox of cigars (whose shape alone entitles them horses and buggies, and indulge in all the luxury and exceeding delight that common am bition sims at, and in a space so brief that it would seem to have been effected by the geniof the "magical lamp." There things honest pledding industry cannot attain, and, thereore, the rut seller is a terrible drawback and stumbling block for the mechanic, in two ways first by selling them the slugs which poison the heart, making them a source of sorrow and sadness to their wives and children; and secondly, by alluring them from their Our widding ere came, friends crowded each bor, by the thought that their toil cannot acroom,

There is not the least use whatever in appealing to the good scuse and virtue of versons addicted to drinking to abstain from the hellward course of destruction to themselves and precious families, because no matter how much sense and rirtue they may have in other respects, upon this they are beyond all human persuasion, and the only way in the wide, wide world to reachatheir disease, is to cut off the supply of malacia, by recovering the ground from whence it came, as we would plow through and fill up a siagnant pool near bur house, which was dealing feter amongst bur darling children. This is, undoubtedly, the acceptable theory to all, but how is it ever to be put into practice, when our very laws, made for the cotaction of virtue, actually afford protection o the greatest drawback to vittue la the

This license is a positive disgrace to the country for it is palpably not the phrpose of the law to restrain crime, but simply to preserve it as a source of heavy fevenue. If the laws of our land made it a penitentiary act for any p erson to sell under a gallon c whisker, gin, brandy, or rum, except for pureffect to cause a large class of persons to benefit society with their labors on the farm and on other pursuits; and this would the sea, and in be infinitely theter and truer to the purposes of think, than their present work of dealing ou I death and destruction to their fellow creatures.
