She respected Mr. Hamford, if she did not love him; and she was unquestionably in love with the position in society which his wealth would command for her. As for him, he well-nigh worshipped his young sweetheart.

Mr. Hanford had but one relative—a son, Percy, who had been spending several years abroad. He arrived home, however, a few days before the welding, and proved to be a handsome young fellow of twenty-five. He was prevent at the wedding, which was of the most gorgeous character. He also accompanied the pair on their bridal tour, which emisteres the more prominent watering-places.

when they returned to their manasion in the city, the winter season room set in, and they were the gavest of the gay butterflies of fashion. Mr. Hanford was happy in the possesion of his young wife; and the young peeple, is it surprising that, their ages and tastes being nearly alike, found each other's society agreeable? Nor is it surprising that they forgot all the proprieties, and learned before they were aware, that they loved each other with all the fervor of youth.

Otten, when Mr. Hanford was disinctlined, Percy accompanied Grace to balls and places of amusement, and one night found them at the Academy of Music, listening to the opera of "Faust." The matchless music of the piece, and the rentiment of the plot fanned the fire of their love to resistless fury. Percy leabed toward Grace until his bot lips pressed her ear, and whippered love to his own father's wife. When they arrived home, Mr. Hanfor's wife. As they were about to part in the hall, Percy suddenly caught his beautiful companion in his arms and held her passion-

Grace uttered no word, but she flung her arms around her lover's neck, and a lingering kiss was all the answer he needed. And with the kies still warm upon her lips, the wife went to her husband.

During the next week Percy made all the strangements for the elopement. He got together all his available lands, which were considerable, and engaged passages, under an assumed name, on an European-bound steamer. The appointed day came at last. Mr. Hanford acut to his office, as usual, leaving the lover together. They set to work, with a couple of bridged servants, to completes the packing of their trunks. A carriage was in readices, and they entered it in time just to reach the stramer in secson. Closely shouting the wisdows to avoid being seen, they were whirled off. The gait at which they taitled over the pavement quieted Percy's fears of being too late, but, somehow they seemed a long time in eaching the wharf. Still on and on, with no abatement of speed; but still they did not arrive at their destination. Percy pulled aside a curner of the curtain, and perred out. They had still many blocks to go.
