Poetical.

THE SPINNER.
I sat and spun before my door,
A youth along the road came straying;
His hazel eyes a deep smile wore,
And blushed on his cheek were playing.
My glance was from the distaff won;
I sat abashed, and spun and spun.
In friendly tones, "Good day!" he spoke,
With timid grace approaching nigher,
Startled was I, the thread I broke,
My foolish heart leaped high and higher.
The thread once more I fastened on,
And sat abashed, and spun and spun.
He clasped with tender touch my hand,
And vowed none with it could compare—
The very loveliest in the land!
So sweetly plump, and dainty fair,
As with his praise my heart he won,
I sat abashed, and spun and spun.
Upon my chair he laid his arm,
And praised the finely-wrought thread.
So near his mouth, so soft, so warm,
How gently "sweetest maiden," he said,
The while he gazed my face upon.
I sat abashed, and spun and spun.
His handsome face toward my own
Momentary bent with glances winning;
It touched by some old chance unknown,
My head that nodded in the spinning;
He kissed me, this avicious one!
I sat abashed, and spun and spun.

Selected Miscellany.
The Fortune of War.
I was chatting one day with an old school-fellow of mine, who, though young, was a veteran of some service, when the conversation turned upon his own career. "Fudge," he said, "give me credit for much more than I deserve." They complimented me on having obtained my position by talent and industry, and all that; but the fact is, I have been an extremely lucky man—more so, perhaps, than I deserve. The only thing for which I can really consider myself entitled to any credit is in this: I have been a good deal of a man in which you have conducted some of your last years."</
