Knowing the alacuty and public spirit which our citizens have heretofore shown on all occasions of the same nature, and the indulgence which they have always manifested towards all those who at any time have endeavored to promote the weifare of the public.

I shall take the liberty of recommending for their cons de ation one gentleman whose talen's as an orator and statesmen, and sent ments as a republican, justly entitles him to the confidence of his fellow citizens-that is Mr. John Stephen, who is a gentleman of the highest talen's, and whose using genius if properly appreciated by his fellow citizens, will no doubt, prove an honor to shis country and a credit to himself, and who if it be posable to prevail upon him to accept the important trust, will no doub', d.scharge it so as to be of infinite service to his country, and to merit the just applause all good nien. The coasting trade, and internal commerce would encrease with unexampled rapidity, and our numerous mill seats and waters brought into use.—This policy would indeed be very galling to England, and make her repent in dust and ashes for the insults she has offered us. As our strength encreased, hers would decay-her oppressed citizens would seek an assylum here, and in a few years she would be no longer the bully of the ocean. It is thus that Nourishing nations, have, by the folly of their rulers, fallen to decay.

But if a non-in portation agreement should be entered into, and English cotton goods only prohibited, how easy would it be to bring English goods by another route, and enter them as the goods of some other nation. We should be obliged to pay something more for them and the English would lose no-

It is probable however that those goods being somewhat dearer, on account of the change which would take place in the manner of doing business, some people might be induced to embark extensively in the cotton manufactory; but if any persons should do so, what would be their fate if the prohibition was taken off or the non-importation relinquished by an amicable treaty with our firm friends the English? This is excity what happened after the peace, thou-ands of manufacturers were ruined as soon as the non-importation agreement was relinquished and the British hegan again to pour in their goods at long credit.

Some selfish people may object to my plan of desence, because it would make cotton goods come higher to the consumer. To which I answer, that they would be no higher than the same articles were thirty years ago; that the money would be made up by purchasing a coarser and stronger article, as was generally done through the revolution; that it might also be reimbursed by lowering the duty on articles from the West Indies; that every year would reduce the price of cutton goods, till at last we could undersell the British in any market. We have many advantages for carrying on the cotton manufacture which Britain wants, and it is admirably adopted to attract population to the western | Mons. Fe
