Latest Foreign Intelligence.

From London papers to the 24th August, received at the office of the New-York Mercantile Advertiser, by the ship Iris, Skinner, from London.

Our yesterday's letters from the Coast inform us, that a brisk firing was heard from Ambletuse, evidently directed against a few of our vessels, which were seen directly standing in shore; but as the firing was not of long duration, no consequence is attached to the result. The Duke of York, after reviewing the troops at Dover on Wednesday, proceeded to Storn Cliff, where General Moore had made the necessary preparations for his Royal Highness's reception.

The articles by yesterday's Gottenburgh mail afford additional proofs of the warm interest which the Emperor Alexander takes in the cause of the unfortunate Bourbons; and, as there seems no doubt of his serious intention to attempt the restoration of that illustrious House, it is considered, and by no means irrationally, that he means to place one of the Princes at the head of the army to be employed for that purpose.

The report was yesterday morning revived, and with still more positiveness than on the preceding day, that an interview was certainly to take place yesterday between two great and illustrious Personages. We have already affirmed, that no such interview had yet taken place, and we now repeat the assertion with undiminished confidence.

We have the pleasure to acquaint the public, that upwards of twenty thousand quarters of foreign wheat have been entered inwards at the Custom-house, and 13,990 of that entered the 21st inst. GOTTENBURG, Aug. 12.—The Prince De Conde, the Duke of Orleans, and another of the French Princes, are very soon expected at Riga, where it is said, that two English frigates are to convoy them; they will proceed from thence to some convenient place in the Russian dominions to meet Louis the XVIIIth, leave having been given by the Emperor of Russia for that purpose; their avaut Couriers passed through Gottenburg for Riga, on the 10th inst.

A Norwegian Gentleman, who has been traveling along the coast of France, by Havre, from Boulogne, Calais, Ostend, &c. to Amsterdam, which place he left 12 days, says, that the greatest dissatisfaction prevailed every where but particularly in the army. In Boulogne there were 1800 vessels of all descriptions, which number it was intended to increase to 3000; in the vicinity were about 24,000 troops, and about 15,000 near Ostend. These were the bulk upon the coast, but there were considerable more up the country. He says that though the invasion of England was much talked of, and every preparation made for it, but few persons believed it would ever take place, and that since the late trials the name of Bonaparte was execrated, and the restoration of the Bourbons anxiously wished for; and that nothing but the fear of again wandering through all the horrors of the late revolution prevented their declaring in favor of it in Holland; he says that the people were groaning under their oppression.

AN ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE LOUIS XVIII.

This affair is likely to exercise so much interest and conversation, that we think it right to insert a correct translation of the statement which appeared last night in the Courier de Londres; particularly as the editor of that paper says—"The English newspapers have given an account of this affair from such incorrect notes, that the transaction is absolutely disfigured."

On Friday the 20th July, two men came into a billiard room, kept by one Coulon, a Frenchman by birth, and put several indirect questions to him concerning the king. They were acquainted with Coulon's intimacy with the King's domestics, particularly his cook, and asked Coulon, in a more direct manner, "Whether the king went abroad frequently?—If he went out by himself?—What were the number and persons of his suite? and if they were armed?" Coulon, thinking these questions did not arise from mere curiosity, gave on each point the answer required.

In the course of the conversation, the two persons enquired, to whom the billiard table belonged? "It is mine (said Coulon) but I have not paid for it." "How, then do you expect to pay for your establishment?" "I got a loan of the money, and I intend to pay for it out of the profits." "There is a way (replied the strangers) by which you might immediately gain a great deal of money." "And how so?" "We will tell you; but the thing is to be a profound secret." "O, if that were all," said Coulon. "But take care, your life might be in danger." "Never mind; say on."

The man then explained to him their plan; and said, that being acquainted with all the servants of the king's family, and particularly the cook, he could go into the kitchen at any time without exciting any suspicion. "If you should succeed (added they) your fortune is made."

Coulon hesitated;—spoke to his wife. The two strangers sent for punch and made Coulon drunk, and his wife also (the latter understanding but little French, took no part in the conversation.) "Take no apprehension about your wife (said they next;) we will carry her to France along with you; and we repeat it; your fortune is made."

The glasses of punch went round briskly; Coulon, fearing to intoxicate himself, would drink no more. They separated; and on seeing them to the door, Coulon heard the two strangers say to each other, in bad Italian, "Time presses; we have not a moment to lose." Next day, Sunday the 22d, a man called twice during the forenoon at Coulon's. He was gone out. In the evening a man he did not know came and asked him to walk along with him a few yards; and spoke of the conversation that had taken place the day before. Coulon agreed. The unknown carried him into the Old Town, then to the New Town and then in a house the situation of which he could not point out, on account of the darkness of the night, and the winding lanes by which he had been conducted to it. There they found one of the two persons he had seen the night before, who asked him, as did the man who had been his guide, if he still persisted in his resolution? Coulon replied "Yes, why not?" Champagne was called in. They fell to drinking, and one of the two strangers got drunk.

The following is the manner in which it was resolved to execute their plan: Coulon was to go and visit the king's cook, and tell him that for a long time past he had not ate any mutton chops, and that he should ask him to do a few. After the precaution of making the cook drunk, he was to throw into the pot a parcel with which he was to be provided. "Very well (said Coulon;) but the money you have promised me; you have promised me 400 louis, but you have given me nothing." The stranger who was drunk said, "I don't know if Boyer would give you so much as that." He who was sober said, in an angry tone, "What do you mean by that? Boyer is not here; he is gone, and will not return for two days."

Coulon insisted on the money; again mentioned his wife, the expenses of the journey, &c. They told him not to be uneasy on that score; that he had nothing more to do than to come next day at eleven o'clock in the evening, and be within 20 yards of the Village Neuf; that there some one would give him the packet; that he was to put it into the pot on Tuesday, the 24th July; that then he should go to the Five Gallows, where he should find a person who would conduct him to a place of safety, and carry him into France. "And my wife," said Coulon. "Give yourself no trouble on that head; and there is a ducat to drink with the cook."

At one in the morning they left this house; forced away Coulon, who wished to stop till day, saying, that his house was shut, and they carried him back to his house by bye-ways.

Coulon immediately went and waited on M. the Baron de Melville, Usher to the Queen, and informed him of the plot. M. de Melville communicated it to M. de Pienne, First Gentleman of the Chamber to the King's Chambers; and M. Count de Avary, Captain of the King's Guards, ordered that the report should be put in writing, signed and cyphered.

M. the Count d'Avary thought it proper to conceal from his Majesty the danger till he had obtained more positive information. The life of all the Royal Family was threatened, and he was afraid that the sensibility of the King, alarmed for the safety of the Queen, and of Madame the Dutchess d'Angoulême, would betray a secret, which his courage would easily have kept if his own life merely had been in danger.

Without losing a moment, M. the Count d'Avary sent to ask an audience of M. the President de Hoyrn, in which he laid before him an account of the intended crime, pointing out to him the necessity either of preventing the consequence, or of punishing the authors. From the time that Louis XVIII. had resided at Warsaw, the French government had one Galon Boyer, with the title of Commercial Agent. There never had been a person in that capacity at Warsaw before. Note of the French Editor.
