SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

VIEWE OF RESSIA LAb ut six weeks ago, when the alliance with Russia firs became a sub-].A of public discussion, vo y severe reproaches were dealt upon all those who did not appear to regard it as a measure of much promise . It is pr baile, that the public, however, will soon a dopt this censured opinion The alliance has taken place; and, as yet, no one has teen able to point ounday way, in which'll ustild, without the sid of Austria or Prussia, can possibly give to France any thing worthy even of the name of sendyance, except by a co-operation with Ep. gland in the Mediterranein Such eo speration appears to have begun a but, there in at present, little hope that it will enswer any other purpose than that of gratifying the ambition of Rotain. at the expences perhaps, of the Porte, and final It to the great it jury of the British colonies in the east. The hublic will remember with what explision Mr. Pitteriluing his defence of the ignominious prace of Ameins, Hwelf upon the deces of ancellored in establishing the republic of the Seven Litinds. - With respect to the Porte ! said he, we have done every thing we were bound to da; nay; more, we have some colled the French to the Evacuation of Egypt; and have stipulated for the integrity of her doinhing al. There is another object which we L'have obtained, and to which I think dot in much introttance has been given as it litterves ! mean the ceriblisoment of an infant posters 818. the Republic of the Seven Islands, cirtalaly an requisition of great importance to this commery. not inferior, perhaps; to the portession of Maries the January we muit regard this opinion as a thing of all stains circumstances ? ? 123 delivered merely with a free to effect for he de he will a confisence delivers an Epialia in ance to this country. as not to be inferior, perhans, to the possession of Malta it elf. Abthe first blush this will certainly appear to be going very far; but, when we come to consider how great the value of Malta is in the estimation of the present ministers; when we recollect, that, avowe ly, they thought the perpetual posters on of Malta an chject for which, and which aline, it was worth while to r new the war; when we consider this, what must we think of the past compared with the present conduct of Mr Pitt? Rut where, indeed, shall w., as to any branch of administration, look, in that gentleman's conduct for the steady operation of principles! Where shall we look for any thing and starts of necessity or convenience?-The policy of Hu-sia, or at least, the probable and exp-cled policy of Russia has been very clearly and ably developed in an essay lately published in the Morning Chronicle, where, from facts and argumens that it would be diffi ult to controvert, a conclusion is drawn, that the .lliance between Englan and Russia, by tavoring the projects of Hussia in the Mediterranean and with resped to the Turkish dominions, will naturally tend to add greatly to that jealousy, with which, as was abserved in a former Register, Austria has long viewed the ambitious strictes of the Russian Emperors. What such a feeling may produce it would be hard to say; but, there surely would be no great room for astonishment, if Austria were to be found, at no distant period, am ngst the bellige ent enemies of Russia. " How!" some one will say, " Austria assist France!" No : out, Austria may be permitted to endeavir to preserve herself; and, if she be in great da ger from the ambition of Russia, and no lo ger in danger from this of France, there is no reason who her arms should not be tireacd against the former, though she thereby aid the cause of the latter. There is one reason, indeed, and that is, that, by thus pursuing her own interests, her conduct would ton to increase the dangers hat threaten England tacher than which she ug. t to side with Russia a gainst France, though at the system risk of her own existence as a great power; but, this rea son, though of cogency irresimble at Llo-d's and the Bank, is, unfortun dely, of linke weight at Vienna, where people are so forward as to think, that they are, by no law, of ei has Gid er man, bound to perish firthe sake of anation, s. me of whose leg slators have lumuly proclaime that it is " too hovest to have any connect in with continental powers" Whatever effect the alliance between England and Russia, and the consequent increase of Russian influence and power in the Mediter anean, may produte with regard to the sensations and conduct of Austria, it is pretty certzin, that that i flience and powe-, if it be suffered to exist in any considerable degree, must, finally, and parmage, very soon, town, for the discovery of which suitable | become extremely danger us to G. Britain, that is to say upon a supposition that the possession of her colonies in the East-Indies are assential to the support of her power; for what security has that great statesman, lord Harrowny, obtained, that in less than two vetr, Russia shall not be on the side of France in a war against England? Or, what mean; has he, in such ase, in view to pievent the feet na waich Russia is now gering in he Medite ranean, from being employed against our possessions in Ima ? Ra sia it is evident, has enter dinto the alliance upon her own terms; and, f mevery thing we have yet seen, the re it little ou that she will turn it solely to the nurpoces of her own ag grandisement. The rumor of her having obtained from our ministe s a stipulation or the cession of Malta to her, can hardl, be founded in truth; but, it is by no means impob ble, that oie of her object is to vet po sessi in of that fortiess; nor is it at all unlikely, that she may therein succeed and, perhaps, by virtue of a threat, to leave us to sustain she war alone. Malta Was, during the last was, the bone of contention between England and Mussia. The latter now has reason to expect that circumstances will not permit us to break with her " for such a triffe," as Bonaparte called it. Accession, might too serve Mr. Pitt as a pretext for demanding that peace, which he will so in again find necessary, in order to enable him to' " husband our resources against another day of trial "-What, shall w, who have continuall been blaming the ministry for not obtaining allies upon the con inent, now blame Mr Pitt fo having firmed an alliance with Russia? N .: he is not blamed for having fo. med an alliance with Russia; and, it is possible, that he may merit praise for it; but if that alliance only serves to unite the arms of Austria with those of France, there can be no doubt that sither the forming it, or the terms a dimanagement of it. will be a subject of ver, strong and very juice censure An alliance with frussia, to be i ffi-ient for our good, can only be subsidiary to an alliance with one, at leasts of the o'he great powers of the continent & in any other way it can, at the present time, servely aff mil-us any real aid and may do us a considerable deal of livered? It was this part of Mr Pirt's speech which gave vise to that admired preceof humor which was published soon afterwards, in the ture of SEPTIMIUS, in which the children folly of the whole affair was pointed out and ridiculed.
