It was not till that moment then, that acres to five hundred thousand. the republicans, who had already obtained the honors and emoluments of an office, of who had the greatest chance of obtain. Ing them, become the objects of rivalry mote their own ambitious purposes, step has determined to send a new Minister forward to claim their expected reward. to London. repeated menace? And are we not now entitled to some of the fruits of the victory ?" Dazzled by this splendid picture of !. their ewn exploits, these men are prone great for their services, no competitor can be so well entitled to the confidence of the people. Let these splendid expectations be d'sappointed, and their adherence to the republican interest is no longer to be trusted, Here then is one source of division But let their efforts be success ful in sowing suspicions of their riva;'s principles, and in overthrowing his pretensions; and they immadiately crease a new division among the republican party. The virtue of their rivals may not indeed be affeeled by this defeat; tho' their bosoms may still heat as high as ever with the fervor of republican principles; yet they are maimed in their exertions, to pro mote the republican cause; the eye of su-picion has fastened upon them; and the people will no longer receive benefit from those in whom they will no longer confide. "True there are men, who assume to themselves the title and the garb of republicanism, to conceal their own contracled designs. These men remain under the banners of the party fo long as they have a hope of sharing in the spoils. But once let them feel the futility of these hopes, once let them see that there are others, who better deserve respect, and who are more successful in its attainment; and their ambition will be confined to the discovery of some plausible pretext for deserting to the opposite party. Who can consider the division of such men as worthy of the slightest regret! I heir adherence reflects a suspicion and disgrace upon the real republicans. They even desert their cause on the most important | peale questions. They add to the number, without increasing the energy of the party. They lull them into a fatal confidence and premature repose by giving them the appearance of irresistible strength. Like the mouldering pieces that enter into an arch, they for a time deceive the eye: smaller burthens are laid upon it wit' out danger; but at the very moment, when it bears upon its bosom the very best hopes and the most inestimable rights of the people, the d ceitful fragments tum ble in and endanger the security of the whole. It is therefore the interest of the republicans, that such rotten members should be eternally divided from their party. To such men as James Elliott of Vermont, and Aaron Burr of New York, we may furely bid adieu without despondency or regret.

Here then let us delineate the outlines of republican policy. When they investigate measures, let them employ toleration towards their friends: when they investigate the characters of men, let them exercise a liberal construction. Slow in denouncing, let their resentment be unextinguishable. When a republican expects the reward of his services, let competitions of interest, let him never forget the necessity of making mutual sa- | ed

Republicans! if this be not your conduct, mark the policy ! mark the exultation! mark the probable triumphs of the federal party!
