The following flory from Spiels's Biographical accounts of Suicide, is affirmed to be literally true:

"In a coffee-house, in a city of Livonia, a man one day made the following proposition. "I am tired of life, and if any body would be of my party, I would not helitate to quit this world." No body answering him, he said no more; but after some time, all the company having left the room except two persons, these came up to him, and asked him if he were really ferious in the proposition which he had made?-Yes, gentlemen said he, in a determined tone of voice. "I never speak without due reflection and I never retract what I have advanced." "Then we will be of your party, for we have formed the same design." Why so gentlemen? My actions are always determined by an adequate motive, and I am incapable of urging a man to adhere to fuch a resolution as this unless his missortunes be such as to tender life insupportable to him."

"We are loaded with debts without the means of discharging them. We are unable o live any longer with honor, and we are incapable of having recourte to base and dishonorable means. Those whose hopes will be disappointed by our death, have already rec-ived much more than they were legally entitled to "

"I had one day," faid one of them, the good luck to break a confiderable bank at Sa I was immediately surround. ed by sharpers, who proposed to play with me. I lost all my winnings in a sew deals and much more. I gave a note for the furbius, which I cannot take up"

"I," said the other "had a commission in the army. I had g ven proots of courace, and merited promotion, in order to obtain which I contracted some debts. But a young nobleman, who had never been in action, having been advanced over my head. I gave in my relignation, without reflecting until it was too lite that I had no other resource in the world. The num ber of my creditors has increased, and I have now no credit with any one. I know my inability to fulfil my engagements, and, determined to impole on no man, I am compelled to put an end to my existence.

"Gentlemen," replied the man who had given rise to this conversation, "I admire your principles, your resolution, and your firmness. If, however, I possessed the means of removing the ground of your despair, I should teel hanry in making you ren unce you noble ploj al, but all that I have left will barely fusince to pay for a Supper, if you will accept one; and at the last bottle we will immortalize ourselves! Bravo! exclaim de the others, "this" is admirable."

"The day was fixed, and an excellent Supper was ordered; the table was covered with dainties and there was plenty of the best wines A strong dose of a senick was put into one bottle, which was to be drunk a last. While these preparations were making the two debtors repaired to a neighbouring house of ill fame, where they met with another man, who had come this ther to console himself in the arms of venal beauty, for the rigour which he experienc ed from a lady to whom he paid his addresses. But this den of corruption mly Elled him with disgust and horror. He became glooiny and melancholy. When in this humor, he was address-I by the other two persons, who, after some conversation, informed him of their delign He seemed to relish it, and to be disposed to make a fourth in the party. In he state of mind in which he then was, the tak of persuafion was easy; they blinded his judgment by their lophistry, and he accompaied them to the place. "The person who was to pay for the supper expecting only two guells was furprised at seeing a third He inquired in to the motive which had influenced the de termination of his new colleague, and being satisfied with them, they all sat down to table. The original proposer of the plan was in a very good humor, and made a long speech on the reloution which he had formed. "I have," faid he, " feen so much of human lite, that I suspect there is little more for me to fer Every thing tends to convince m- that man is a very poor creature, and that he can only be happy by contributing 'o the happiness of others. One person may do this in one way, another in another, but I could only do with my fortune; and I accordingly employed it for that purpose in the best manner I could. If any one proved to me in a plausiole way, that a certain sum would make him happy, I gave it him. The consequence was that my fortune was soon spent; and I am now ruined and wholly unable to render a service to any man. It would be possible, indeed, to subsist by my labour, but I should infallibly sink under such a mode of life; and besides I cannot believe that any man ought to exist for h mself a one."

". The last of our heroes here interrupted the philosopher—that is the very point on which I must contradict you. If man did not exist for himself, as you suppose, and you have proved, by your life, that such is our opinion, I certainly ought to continue to live. But I, who am of a different opinion, and who have lived only for myselt, finding no more pleasure in lise, am resolved to quit it.

" Every man, my friend," replied the first, " has his own mode of thinking on this subject, and acts accordingly. There can be no wilh then to make proselytes. You will die in pursuance of your own system, and I in pursuance of mine."

I'ne very sight of you makes me shudder. It was only in a moment of madnesr, that I could give my approbation to your project, and consent to follow your example. If I am so fortunate as to open my eyes in time, do you be still so wise not to accuse me of cowardice, or usual credit. and accept my excuses for having so incensiderately consented to make a fourth. May the pleasing hopes which you have formed be realized. May you! be happier in the next world than you lity, have been in this!" He then rose to leave the room. "But," exclaimed the others, "did not you promise, upon your honor to do as we did ?" " True, tles, for family use. gentlemen, but you should congratulate yourselves on my conversion. Applaud yourselves for that return to my senses which your dreadful example has occasioned." He cast a look of pity upon them. They all endeavoured to follow him, but could not. "I left them, said he to me, adding that the third who was nearer to his end than the two others, testified his approbation of his conduct by an inclination of his head."
