Caution with respect to the violent treatment of CATS. In the Memoirs of the Academy of Turin, Vol. 6th, is found a very interesting communication of Mr. Rossi, entitled "Observations, dissections and experiments on the bite of enraged animals." One of the most important facts contained in it, is, that Cate may by ill treatment be rendered mad, and without having been themselves bitten, may by their bite produce the most violent Hydrophobia. He relates the following instances:---A young man was bit by a Cat in the leg; he suffered acute pain for some time; this crased, and he became well. Every method of preventive for hydrophobia was used, cautery, caustic, alkalies, blisters, &c.-all in vain; the 49th day the symptoms appeared, and the patient died with his teeth fixed in a piece of iron. It is remarkable, that the Cat had only been rendered furious by being confined in a room and termented.

A Cowfeeder having remarked a Cat often coming to steal the milk in his dairy, lay in wait for it, and attacked it with a latchet. There was a considerable centest, until at last, the Cat mable to avoid the approaching blow, leaped at the man and seized his chin, whence there was no possibility of detaching it, but by cutting off its head. The patient was carried to the hospital, and all the preventives of hydrophobia, as cautery, purging, bleeding and mercurial salivation, applied. -On the 20th day the fatal symptoms made their appearance; he experienced much difficulty in s vallowing water, but this he overcame with great fortitude; the difficulty encreased, the wound became bul; the patient grew furious, endeavored to bite every one that came near him, was bound in chains, and immediately broke them in pieces--leaped from his bed, ran up and down the hospital, attempting to bite all he met, till reaching the outer door in order to escape, he was seized with a shivering and fell down dead. On dissection the appearances in both these cases were precisely similar to those of hydrophobia. The dreadful leasen taught by the cases here stated should be carefully kept in mind by all who are, from their tempers and habits of life, much exposed to the temptetion or the necessity of using harsh methods animals.

SALEM, September 27. Further accounts by captain Williams, from Leghorn.

Captain Williams informs us. that the extension of Bonaparte's authority in Italy, which threatens to light up a new war upon the continent of Europe, appeared to be very mortifying to the people that country. It was with great reluctance Genoa changed her flag for that of France; and though she was promised the enjoyment of her ancient laws, customs, and usages, yet on the change of government, they found themselves under a set of new officers from France, and loaded with French duties, and every regulation adapted to the benefits of t e protecting country.

Naples continued to be over-awed by the French, though they had not vet attempted to enterthat kingdom; but it was said that continual contributions were the price of their forbearance, and that they threatened to invade it, the moment a British or Russian soldier set foot upon its shores. A British 74 gun-ship was still in waiting to take off the king & his family the moment arms upon Tripoli, seems not to have had its proper effort upon the bey of Tunis, who is represented to be a resolute, determined fellow. It will be recollected that our squadron, while blockading Tripoli, took a Tunisian corsair with her two Napolitan prizes, attempting to violate the blockade. This the bey has affected to consider as an aggression against him, and has continually demanded reparation from the United States, or threatened them with war; and all attempts to settle the dispute have hitherto failed. A few days before captain Williams left Leghorn, a letter was received there from an officer on board the Essex frigate, written to his friend, an American gentlemen at Leghorn, and dated at Messina, about the middle of July, stating that that frigate and a brig had just returned from Tunis, where they had been by order of the commodore, to demand of the bey an unequivocal determination with respect to the relations of peace and friendship with the United States; and that his answer, confirmed by the oath by his beard, was, that if the United States did not restore his corsair and her prizes in sixty days, he would make war upon them. This news excited alarm among the Americans at Leghorn; which was increased by the arrival of an Imperial vessel from the Isle of Elba, reporting that two Tunisian chebecks were there bound on a cruise.

The Tunisian coast is extensive, and has many bays and harbors, so that ablockade could not be so effectual against that power as against Tripoli, and her opportunities of giving annoyance would be much greater. However, had the Bey been seriously determined on war, one would have thought he would have undertaken it; while we were engaged with the 'Tripolitans, when it must have divided and weakened our force. The condemnation of our vessels at Gibraltar, which were taken coming out of Cadiz, captain Williams says, was much
