BIOGRAPHICAL.
From the (Ken.) Independent Gazetteer.
CHARACTER OF
JAMES MADISON,
SECRETARY OF STATE.

If real merit gives a decided superiority to the human character, you here see a man who possesses no ordinary claim to such pre-eminence. Without the artificial title to greatness, which gives dignity in other countries, he is the noble of nature, and derives his pure lineage from simple worth.

Perhaps there is no better evidence, that this part of the portrait is correctly drawn, than that Mr. Madison has spent a useful life, without acquiring a single enemy.— This is the more extraordinary; because it has been principally devoted to the service of his country, in scenes of difficulty and enterprise, and in councils where passion so frequently overleaps the bounds of modesty and moderation. A phenomenon so rare, is seldom to be seen in any country; but much less could its appearance have been expected in America. Yet, here, amidst the rage of party spirit, beneath whose sway, the humble and elevated have indiscriminately suffered persecution, like the oak, Mr. M. seems to have braved the tempest. From his political opponents, he has received that homage, which leaves his fame untouched, and his dignity, unimpaired. This, surely, exhibits an illustrious example of the potency of Virtue in making Prejudice tributary to its charms, and of bearing the soul away captive, against our own will.

Mr. Madison, like his noble friend the President, was born in an age of great events. Congeniality of education, of sentiments and pursuit, had fitted these great men to shine in the highest sphere of action, amidst those brilliant scenes, which ultimately unfolded the unparalleled genius and dignity of the American character. It is to their immortal honor, that they have never for a moment, deviated from each other in political opinion and friendship; for great men are born to "sway the wilderness of free minds," and should never be separated. Whilst the one devoted his time to a variety of subjects in literature and philosophy, the other, principally made the science of Legislation the study of his life. Let it not be understood, however, that Mr. Madison is deficient in any of that variegated knowledge which should be acquired, by the statesman, the philosopher and the gentleman.—His speeches evince an intimate acquaintance with history and jurisprudence; and his writings bear every impression of sound logic, refined by rhetoric. Besides these more elevated accomplishments, and a correct knowledge of what is commonly called the dead languages, Mr. Madison speaks French with considerable elegance and ease.

The political character of this gentleman, shines with distinguished lustre in the annals of this empire. His principles, unswayed by the prejudices of party spirit, emanate from mature deliberation; are equally the offspring of an honest heart, and an intellect that embraces with wonderful perspicuity and precision the whole range of Political Science, and the true genius and interest of his country. To these principles he seems to have adhered, amidst all the revolutions of party, with that calm undeviating spirit, which could only flow from conscious integrity and an understanding convinced by reason.

Mr. Madison, like his illustrious friend, was called early into the walks of political life. We see him upon the floor, of the Virginia Convention, with those models of elocution, Henry, Lee, Randolph and Grayson. It was the most august body of collected wisdom, the world had ever seen. The subject of their convocation, was the most sublime and interesting, that ever engaged the attention of a deliberative assembly. It was to decide the destiny of a young empire, that had pulled down the fabric of Gothic despotism in the New World, to open an everlasting retreat for the sufferings of the Old. The speeches of Mr. Madison in that assembly, and upon that occasion, will remain the durable memorials of a great mind unfolding itself and preparing the way, for the distinguished figure which history shall assign to him in the annals of this empire.

In deliberative assemblies, there is surely no man more truly respectable than Mr. Madison. He conveys to the world a lesson that wisdom and moderation are congenial plants that delight to flourish in the neighborhood of each other, and should never be separated. As a cool, pointed reasoner, he is among the first orators of the age to captivate the understanding by convincing it.—When he arises to deliver his opinions, an universal silence evinces the attention which his auditory are willing to bestow upon the orator.—Yet Mr. Madison is not one of those boisterous declaimers whose vehemence extorts the silence of admiration; nor does he, like Pitt and Murray, command attention from the expectation of mere amusement.—On the contrary, in the oratory of this gentleman, there is no glare, no impassioned theatrical rant to enchain our eyes on the orator, no voice of any great strength, to charm by the melody of his tones, or the variety of its modulations.—His manner, that the air of fatigue, from a sickly constitution, which has been impaired by a life of close application, you might see the falling tear of Governor Morris to inspire your sympathy, for the blazing dagger of Ed.
