Translation of a proclamation of the elector of Bavaria to the Bavarians.

BAVARIANS!
At a moment when I was solely occupied with your prosperity, when I foresaw no danger, I was forcibly separated from you.

Austria, for the preservation of which the generous blood of the Bavarians has so often flowed, had conceived perfidious designs against you and against me. Your sons, my brave soldiers, were demanded with menaces, to be disseminated in the Austrian army, and to fight against a power which has at all times protected the independence of Bavaria.

That the Bavarians were no longer to fight for their country, but for foreign interests: thus the very name of the Bavarian army, was to have been destroyed.

My duty, as a prince, and as the father of a faithful and independent people, must have led me to repel propositions so dishonorable for the nation, and to maintain with firmness the neutrality of my states.

I still flattered myself with the hope of seeing accomplished the most ardent of my wishes—the repose of my country. The negotiations upon this head, were not yet broken off, when Austria, faithful to the system of annihilating the independence of Bavaria, violated the most sacred treaties, made her army cross the Inn, and treated you as the inhabitants of a conquered country. The most enormous requisitions were made; you were deprived of the most necessary instruments of your industry, even of those of your agriculture; your fields were laid waste, your cattle carried off by force; you were inundated by a depreciated paper currency; even a great number of your sons were constrained to serve under the standards of Austria.

After so perfidious an invasion, after such unheard of outrages, my dignity commanded me, as prince and protector of the nation to take up arms, and to deliver the country from its oppressors.

The emperor of the French, the natural ally of Bavaria, flies to our succour, with his intrepid warriors, he comes to avenge us; he drives your brutish and your sons fight in the ranks of these brave fellows, accustomed to victory, and already we see the dawn of our safety.

Bavarians, who patiently bear the evils which the enemies of your country overwhelm you; remember your prince who knows your sufferings, who shares them, and who cannot support the idea of being separated from you, but in the persuasion that in preserving his individual liberty, he has secured to himself the means of acting with an absolute independence for his dear and faithful subjects.

Our good cause is under the protection of a just God, and of a courageous army, commanded by an invincible hero. Let the rallying-word of every Bavarian be for his prince and for his country. Wurtzburgh, 10th Oct. 1805.
Signed MAX. JOSEPH, Elector
