states and the West India islands, belong- | Quinly, to Mirs. Margaretta C. Brown, all ing to the enemies of Great Britain. In of this city. the European voyage, the cargo consisted | Married last evening, by the Rev. Mr. of the production of the colonies. In the Kurtz, Mr. Jacob Miller, of this city, voyage to the West Indies, it consisted to the amiable Mrs. ELIZABETH SWAR, of the goods of the power to which the widow of Jacob Swan, of Harford county. colony belonged, and to which the ship was destined. The ship and cargo in every case, were the property of American citizens; and the cargo had been landed, and the duty on it paid, in the United States. It was decided that these voyages were continuous, and the cargoes were condemned on the principle, that the commerce was illegal. These seizures are incompatible with the law of nations as above stated; they involve no questions of contraband or blockade. On what principle then can these seizures be defended? On princi- to 45 sous; cocoa 27 to 30; mulasses ples laid down in a series of orders issued by the British government in 1793, 1794, 1798. By the first of these orders, all commerce between neutrals and enemy's island. colonies is forbidden, though the other orders afterwards a little relax this rule. In support of those orders it has been urged, that as colonial trade is a system of monopoly in peace, neutral powers have no right to participate in it in time of war, and that belligerents may interdict it, although allowed by the parent country. But does it follow, because a parent country in time of peace monopolizes the whole trade of its colony, that in time of war it has no right to regulate it at all: on the contrary, that that right passes to the belligerent. If this doctrine was sound, it would certainly establish a new and singular mode of losing and acquiring rights. But are not in every state the co lonies a part of her domain, and do they not continue so until they are severed by conquest? The right of regulating trade rests in the state over its whole territory. and no distinction can be taken in reason between different parts of the same state. But neutrals have a right to trade with colonies in as ample an extent as the mother country will allow it. The right depends not on the chance of war, nor on the will of the belligerent. If the orders of the British government alluded to contained the known law of nations, there would have been no occasion for any of them, nor could they have varied from each other, in the manner in which they do so vary. I now, says he proceed to shew that the decisions are contrary to the agreement between the two governments on this subject. By the order of November 1793, some hundred American vessels were carried into port and condemnted. Those stizures were surmitted to commissioners, who condemned them and awarded compensations, which Great Britain has hono ably paid. It is impossible not to consider what passed on that occasion, but as an adjustment of the present principle, and until the case of the E-sex, not one American vessel engaged in this com n ree had been condemned, although frequently met with by the British cruizers. In Robinson's r ports, page 368, it is clearly es tablished by the learned judge of the admir lty, that an American has a right to import the produce of an enemy's colony into the United States, and to send it alterwards for the general comperce of Europe; and that the lan ling of the goods in the United States, and paying the duties, should preclude all further question upon the voyage.

Lord Hawkesbury afterwards, in a communication of the 11th of April, expressly stated the same thing—that the produce of the colonies might legally be imported into the United States, and from thence into the mother country; and thus the produce of the colonies and the manufactures of the mother country might find their way to each other by this circuitous route. He complains that after this understanding between the two countries, that this opinion should be departed from in the case of the Essex, which served as a signal for the British cruizers, and that since that time above fifty American ships, engaged in this commerce, have been carried into British ports and are detained. He complains, that Britain gave no intimation of an intention to change her conduct on these points. He adds, that he makes that communication in hopes of a friendly adjustment, not only on this subject, but also on the other, of impressing Amarican seamen, which he admits is a matter of peculiar delicacy, by reason of the si ni-·larity of persons and manners, and particularly from the identity of language with the two nations."
