On the purchase of the Florida.

The English review of national affairs, of political sentiments and measures of government, have been always relied on. They have been under the direction of the ministerial party, containing the true motives of their conduct and the expected consequences of their measures. In the English Reviews of 1783, on national affairs, page 189 and 191, there are observations on the peace then recently made, between England, France, Spain, and the United States of America. The independence of the latter had then been lately acceded to by the court of London, under the authority of parliament. The reviewers of national affairs say, "A long course of time must elapse before the U. States of America can equip a navy force equal to the British, or even to the combined fleets of the two branches of Bourbon. But with respect to Spain, the position of America is different. Before the present peace nothing separated those powers but a river; the cession of the Florida to Spain was one of the wisest articles, on the part of Great Britain, in the late pacification. The vicinity of the American provinces will precipitate a quarrel between the United States and Spain. The contrary of the dispositions, manners, and habits of North Americans and Spaniards is such that it is impossible they should live together for any length of time. The rupture is likely to happen sooner, because that both those nations consider themselves as having been victorious in the late war. Success makes and nourishes ambition. Both America and Spain are too proud tamely to suffer any of those encroachments and insults which must unavoidably arise from the vicinity of their dominions." The above is a faithful transcript, and contains the true reason why Great Britain ceded the Florida to Spain in the year 1783. We do not criminate the British court for this act of policy. That power has conducted itself in this instance towards the United States, as it has done in all others to the other nations of the world. Where she could kindle a war among them, she has sought her own security in the measure. Or, as in the instance of the tribes of unoffensive people who possess the best part of Asia, where she could blow the flame of destructive war, she has availed herself of the opportunity to plunder the weaker and most distressed party. We do not pretend that England is not perfectly the mistress of her own conduct; but this we say, that our ruin is involved in the influence her firings and parisons shall give in America, if that influence is not checked. The system of Great Britain has ever been to govern by the influence of money. Besides the immense sums openly given as subsidies to foreign powers, not less than six millions sterling were expended in the year 1805, under the name of secret service money, and is never to be accounted for. The nations she has subsidized are ruined. Russia is driven to an unnatural alliance with the Turks, to save herself from the ruin which she is threatened. Germany is no longer a mighty empire, holding the balance of Europe. The royal family of Naples has lost its throne, and Portugal is on the brink of ruin. The United States have preserved their neutrality; but it has been owing to a peculiar firmness in our national government, that we are not like the nations mentioned, involved in all the ruins of a British alliance. Where could Great Britain avail herself of secret service money to a greater advantage than in this country? Could not military, headed by M. Pitt, have induced us, by secret agents and emissaries feeding on pensions, to have declared war against Spain, on account of Louisiana, we should have then been the accidental ally of Great Britain at war with the same enemy, having the same object in pursuit, and the same interest in her success as in our own. We must have made peace when she did, and without the claim usually incident to an alliance, because we had no treaty; we must have taken such a peace as she should give us. Louisiana was purchased to great advantage, and the hopes of a war on that side were gone away. But do we not remember the rage, and marks of disappointment which then prevailed among the men who have led and deceived you? The Florida have ever been an object with the United States. The patriots of this nation have always wished our government to have them, from the same reason that the English ceded them to Spain; because they could not remain under the power of that crown without producing a war between Spain and the U. States. There is an attempt to purchase them; they contain a fine tract of country; they extend a long distance between the territory of our nation and the sea. They hold the mouths of navigable rivers, which flow from the interior of our richest soil; they have the harbors, bays and waters, which alone can render that part of the United States valuable. Above all, the purchase will remove the Spanish government far beyond the Mississippi, and assure us peace for years to come. Why then is this purchase so vehemently opposed? Is there any way but that of the secret service money of Great Britain, expended in this country, that can have raised up and maintained so unnatural, so unreasonable an opposition? It is a very easy thing for a lawyer who has situated that country in a public character, to
