

ty, your august spouse, long prove his happiness, and the happiness of your Majesty, and of all the Royal Family."

Both these Speeches were received in the most gracious manner by their Majesties. The Administration of the Department of Holland, the Deputies of several other local Administrations of the Kingdom, and the Staff Officers of the Navy, had also formal Audiences of his Majesty.

Speech of the King.

The following is a Copy of the Speech delivered by his Majesty to their High Mightinesses:

GENTLEMEN,

"When the National Deputies came to offer me the throne which I ascend this day, I accepted it under the conviction that it was the wish of the whole nation—that the confidence and the necessities of all called me to it.

Relying on the intelligence, zeal, and patriotism of the principal public functionaries, and particularly on yours, Gentlemen the Deputies, I have fearlessly weighed in my mind the misfortunes of the nations in their fullest extent. Animate by the strongest desire to promote the welfare of this good people, and entertaining a hope that I should one day attain that end, I stilled those sentiments which, till then, had been ever the object and happiness of my life. I have consented to change my country, to cease to be solely and entirely a Frenchman, after having passed my whole life in preferring to the best of my ability, those duties which that name prescribes to all who have the honor of bearing it.

"I have consented to separate myself, for the first time, from him who, from my infancy, possessed my love and admiration; to lose the repose and independence which these whom Heaven calls to govern cannot have; to quit him the separation from whom would fill me with apprehension, even in the most tranquil times, and whose presence precludes danger.

"I have consented to all this; and, Gentlemen, had I not done so I would nevertheless as yet act the same part, now that by the ardour, joy, and confidence of the people through whose country I have passed, they have proved to me that you were the true interpreters of the nation, now especially, when I am convinced that I may rely on your firm attachment to the interest of your native land, and of your confidence in, and fidelity towards me.

Gentlemen this is the first day of the real independence of the United Provinces. A transient glance at passages is sufficient to convince us, that they never had a stable Government, a fixed destiny, or a real independence. Under that false people, whom they fought and shed by turns, as under the Pranks of the Empire of the West they were never at rest or tranquil.

However, even monarchy is not sufficient for a country which, though powerful and important, is not sufficiently so for its position, which requires forces of the first rank both by land and sea. It will, therefore, be necessary for it to form a connection with one of the great Powers of Europe, with which its unity may be eternally assured without any alteration of its independence.

"This, Gentlemen, is what your nation has done: this is the object of its constitutional laws, and also that of my taking upon me an employment so glorious; this is my object in placing myself in the midst of a people who are, and ever shall be mine, by my affection and softitude. With pride I perceive two of the principal means of government and confidence offering themselves to me; the honor and the virtue of the inhabitants.

"Yes, Gentlemen, these shall be the real supporters of the throne—I wish for no other guides. For my part, I know no distinctions of religion or party—distinctions can only arise from merit and services. My design is only to remedy the evils which the country has suffered. The duration of these evils, and the difficulty in remedying them, will only increase and realize my glory.

"To effect these objects, I have occasion for the entire confidence of the nation, their complete devotion, and all the talents of the distinguished men who it contains, but particularly of you, Gentlemen, whose zeal, talents and patriotism are well known.

"I am at this moment appealing to the good and faithful Hollanders, before the Deputies of the provinces and principal cities of the kingdom. I see them around me with pleasure. Let them bear to their fellow citizens the assurance of my solicitude and affection; let them carry the same testimony of these sentiments to Amsterdam; that city, which is the honor of commerce and the country, which I wish to call my good & faithful capital, though the Hague will always remain the residence of the Sovereign. Let them also carry the same assurances to their fellow citizens and the Deputies of that neighboring city, the prosperity of which I hope very soon to renew, and whose inhabitants I distinguish.

"It is by these sentiments, Gentlemen, that the union of all orders of people in the state, and by that of my subjects among themselves; it is by the devotion of each individual to his duties, the only basis of real honor assigned to men but principally by the unanimity which has hitherto preserved these provinces from all dangers and calamities, and which has ever been their shield that I expect the tranquillity, safety and glory of the nation, and the happiness of my life."
