From The London Monthly Magazine.

I have looked over Mr. PARKINSON'S late "Tour in America;" and have found in it some harsh expressions and false conclusions drawn from the premises he has laid down. It is the produce of a mind attached to local habits, and discontented with every thing which does not correspond with a particular mode of life and of farming.

The work seems intended to prove, that nature has been extremely unkind to the United States; that the ungrateful soil will never reward the toil of the labourer, and that America seems designed only for convicts. This is his expression, page 489, which perhaps does not merit to be here repeated; but that America holds out a more cheering prospect, is fully proved by the following facts. The United States double their population in 25 year; and I believe that no other nation, not even the Lascities, ever doubled their numbers in so short a period; consequently, as men multiply in proportion to the facility of living, the lands must return abundance in proportion to the labour bestowed upon them; otherwise there could not be that facility of living.

Another proof is, that the six millions of people who inhabit the United States of America import on an average from five to six millions sterling per annum of British merchandise, for which they pay, otherwise they would not be trusted; and they export to the amount of about thirteen millions sterling a year; no other country of the same age ever had so great a commerce; nor is there any country at this time, except England, which in proportion to her population, has so great and productive an industry. Whence then arises the wealth which nourishes such a commerce, if not from the lands?—for America cannot be called a manufacturing country.

From the year 1784 to 1799, a term of fifteen years, the Americans improved fifteen millions of acres of land. The waste lands in England during the last fifty years amount only to 2,800,000 acres. This shows that America is in a rapid state of improvement, and even more so than England.

But if new farms recently cleared of their timber do not produce all which we find on the old and long cultivated estates of England, it is a proof that the country is bad or the people miserable. The American farmer has abundance to eat, to drink, to warm and clothe him; he is owner of the soil on which he lives; no rent to be raised at the expiration of his lease; no landlord to influence him in election; no tax gathered at his door; he is confident of security in equal laws, and has a high sense of that noble independence which acknowledges no superiors but genius and merit; and those are real comforts to a man of feeling. If good time is his, and a particular fine breed of cattle or sheep, are rarely to be found in America, it arises from the population being spread over a great extent of country, and that want of division of labour which enables one man to apply to one thing, and thereby render it as perfect as possible. But the fault is not in the land or climate; and such improvements will be made when the country shall be more filled with people.

Let us look back on England two hundred years:—Not a hedge, not a turnpike road, waggon or carriage to travel in; none of the fine breed of sheep and cattle now so much and justly admired; nor irrigation, nor the productive system of succession of crops; at that time turnips, cabbages, and carrots, were great articles of commerce from Brabant to London. In 1697 the whole exports from England were only three millions and a half a year; the imports near the same sum. But time with industry, has made England what she is, to the great honour of the inhabitants; and time, with industry, will give to the United States of America all that is refined in science and gratifying to rational man.

In one great object of Mr. Parkinson's book it, to prevent English farmers rendering themselves and families unhappy by going to America. With him I am clearly of opinion that they should not go till they have well weighed every circumstance, and consulted the feelings of those they propose to carry with them; for although I know that abundance reigns in America, yet persons always trifling their happiness by removing from their native place, and into a country where the manners and customs are such as they have not been used to. Every pursuit is a kind of trade, which if we cannot follow it in the way to which we have been accustomed, feels irksome. I doubt whether an experienced Devonshire farmer would for some years feel happy in Northumberland; nor would the Northumberland man feel comfortable on a farm in Devonshire. A Frenchman, accustomed to the culture of the vine, would make a bad farmer in England; and the English farmer would become a bankrupt among the vines of France. Local habits, which in a great measure constitute our happiness, and which make a country appear pleasant or disagreeable, extend to the smallest minutiae, to our eating, drinking, travelling, company, &c.

During the last peace the Abbe Gregoire came over from France to England, where he made a tour through the country, and from his amiable character and excellent qualities, was received in the best societies in a very hospitable manner. On his return to Paris I asked him how he liked England? He replied, "The English are a generous, hospitable, good people; and the country would be charming had it pleased God to give them some sunshine, and French cooks." The country (he said) was always enveloped in clouds; and he was almost starved on abominable legs of mutton, roast beef, beef flakes, cabbage & potatoes, none of which were half cooked, and with sauce seldom eatable; the porter was bitter, and the port wine so strong that he could not drink it; and his water he did not like that beverage. In fact, the good Abbe preferred France; and, being of a humane disposition, seemed to feel sorry for the many inconveniences under which, as he supposed, the people of England labored. Hence, if we look into ourselves, and examine the habits we have acquired, we shall find, that by going to reside in a foreign country, the circumstances change, and the unhappiness or ill success which we experience arises more from ourselves than the defects of the country which we adopt. ROBERT FULTON.

LEGISLATURE OF MARYLAND.
