FROM AN ENGLISH PAPER.
PARTICULARS OF THE LOSS OF THE AJAX.
Extract of a letter from an Officer, dated at Sea, April 17.
"On the evening of the 14th February last, when the Ajax was lying at anchor with the squadron off the entrance of the Dardanelles, the alarm was given that the ship was on fire afloat, and so rapid was its progress, that in about twenty minutes the flames rushed up the after hatchway. Even the few on board despaired of getting the fire under; but the moment it came up the main hatchway and took hold of the rigging, the consternation was general, and every person then seemed inclined to provide for his safety. I followed the captain and matter to the fore-castle, and enquired from the latter, whether he had seen any of the young gentlemen? Being answered in the negative, I went immediately in quest of them. One of them I found, and we went immediately out the bowsprit to the spritsail yard, where Capt. Blackwood and some of the officers then were. The captain then plunged into the waves with one of the lieutenants, and was afterwards picked up by a boat from the Canopus, but the lieutenant went to the bottom. Your friend and I were then left to contemplate our awful and perilous situation and that of our unfortunate shipmates. The flames by this time had reached the main and fore tops, and were rapidly approaching us in the spritsail-yard. We looked often around us, minutely examining every quarter not already in a blaze, thinking we might perhaps discover some friend in greater distress than ourselves, to whom we might afford relief; but alas poor Mr. Clerk and Mr. Manners could not be discovered; they, as I afterwards ascertained, upon the first appearance of the flames, jumped overboard before the boats were near the ship, and were never seen any more. The captain had left the ship about ten minutes when a boat from the Windmill, which showed under the bows, into which I immediately lowered down our friend and another young gentleman, and followed them myself. Even on our passage between the Ajax and Canopus, the nearest ship, we were in imminent danger of being our lives. The guns being loaded, were discharging the shot about our ears. There were eight commissioned officers, three warrant, and 15 petty, and not less than 250 of the ship's company."

American,
AND
Commercial Daily Advertiser.
THURSDAY, JULY 2, 1867.
The Secretaries of War and Treasury Departments have been called to Washington by an express sent on to Philadelphia and New-York after them. Mr. Galtin arrived in town last night, and proceeded to the city this morning. They are to sit at a cabinet council, to be held at this crisis, in order to determine on the proper measures to be pursued with regard to the late outrage committed on the frigate Catalpa.

We are much gratified at being able to state that all the tribunes who have been on the recent outrage committed on our flag, except from one quarter, breathe a gentler American spirit, unadulterated with party spleen. The quarter excepted, is the Philadelphia Gazette, whose editor, Reif, has endeavored to palliate the outrage, in attempting to divide the odium of the lawless aggression by throwing blame on the administration. The man who can thus sport with the feelings of a just, generous, and gallant people, when their national honor has been wounded to the heart's core, must be either a pensioned knave or a pitiful zealot of party. Far different are the feelings and sentiments of Major Jackson, who, though a decided federalist, speaks like a man of candor and a friend to his country. In the Commercial Register of the 30th of June he delivers himself in the following just and forcible terms on this subject:—
"There are periods in the history of every nation, when the love of peace, however prevalent, and however cherished, must yield to the impetuous dictate of national honour, and the unavoidable necessity of redressing national wrongs.—In such exigency, it becomes not only the interest but the duty of every citizen to merge all differences of domestic politics in the foreign aggression, and to draw up all party opinions, as a patriotic sacrifice, on the altar of his offended country."
Such an occasion has arisen to the people of the United States—and such an occasion allows no alternative between the dangerous and disgraceful deliberation, or the immediate and decisive vindication of our dearest interests.

The atrocious proceeding detailed in the following article, which we copy from the National Intelligencer, of the 26th inst. and which we deem an official relation of facts, admits but of one atonement—for the reparation must be commensurate with the enormity of the offence. It is not for individuals to prescribe the course of the government—but it is the unalienable right of every citizen, to offer his share of the public indignation and resentment—and we do not hesitate to say, that this outrage and indignity, committed by the express order of a British commander in chief, are without precedent or parallel in the history of the civilized world, connecting as they do the basest murder of innocent and unsuspecting individuals, with the most flagitious abuse of every principle that should govern the conduct of one nation professing friendship, and receiving hospitality from another.
For such conduct there can be but one species of atonement—An express disavowal of the act by the Government of Great Britain, & an unqualified surrender of the Officer or Officers, by whose orders it was perpetrated, to the justice of the United States.—In the refusal of such reparation, open war cannot be more clamorous than the continuance of such outrage and degradation.—And War, thus inevitably imposed, must receive the full support of every American, who justly estimates his personal privileges, or duly respects the rights and independence of his country.
