

Yet still, to see thee dead, to see that Face
Which, fresh in Life, might boast of every Grace,
Now sadly mould'ring in a darksome Grave,
What Eyes o'erflow not? and what Hearts but heav'd
Much more a Parent's, bound by Nature's Chain,
The bursting Torrents of their Grief restrain;
Which, tho' in vain, still cannot cease to flow:
Heav'n took thee hence, and Heav'n will have it so,
Who gave thee first, and now, ordain'd to part,
Resumes again, as whose of Right thou art.

HAPPY, thrice happy Change! distinguish'd Fair,
Remov'd from Earth the Joys of God to share;
Amidst th' angelic Throng, divinely bright,
Thou, lovely Virgin, shin'st a Star of Light,
Whence looking down, thy Soul enlarg'd may view
The empty Trilles human Kind pursue;
Where thy exulting spotless Mind employ'd
Thanks the kind Hand thy earthy Part destroy'd;
Which happy Turn gave Entrance to a State
Of Joys immense, yet permanent as great.

Now who (since Death affords such Bliss) would grieve
To part with Friends? Or ev'n themselves to leave
A toilsome World, which all our Hopes deceive:
Which Happiness to all in Prospect shews,
Ordain'd to follow, and ordain'd to lose;
Unhappy were natural, and th' endearing Ties
Of Blood, whence sure this Fondness must arise,
Join'd to the Love of Life, and conqu'ring Dread
Fix'd on the Mind, of mixing with the Dead.

CEASE then, fond Parents, cease, your Tears restrain,
Nor longer let corroding Sorrows reign:
Heav'n, that recall'd this Blessing, can bestow
Comforts unthought, to sooth a Parent's Woe:
Then yield to Fate, and pleas'd believe her free
From all the Ills of frail Mortality,
Where new Employments shall the Soul delight,
And wond'rous Objects ever court the Sight;
Whence contemplating (God's peculiar Love
To Man) she tastes sublimest Joys above,
And fill'd with Rapture, every Hymn essays
In the Almighty's never ceasing Praise.
