A FANCY. Once, wandering o'er untrodden fields, Far from the bustle of the town, Bound by the spell which fancy wields, I climbed a hill and, looking down. Saw, in the valley far beneath. A darksome wood, where oak trees tall Swayed in the south wind's gentle breath, His throbbing bosoms rise and fall.

But when I reached the vale, alas! And on the very border stood, A mighty hedge I could not pass Grew all about the tempting wood. I caught within the golden ray Of buttercups. The rippling trill Of brooks and fountains in their play With bird-songs seemed the wood to fill.

And, as I listened, on the wind There came a voice, as one who sings; "Oh, mortal, leave the world behind, And scale the hedge on fancy's wings. Be bold; thou standest on the edge Of that enchanted fairyland. Thy doubts have raised the mighty hedge, 'Twill vanish now at thy command.'

I sighed as one who doubts his dream; I saw the thorny hedge grow less; And fainter grew the mystic gleam; The hedge passed into nothingness. The mist of eventide arose, Within a barren vale I stood. The day was sinking to its close-There was no dim enchanted wood.
