

the Moores, in theirs, which was compulsive; who, notwithstanding, had free leave to dispose of their estates in Spaine, before their departure from thence. If the Parliament shall not think fit to let them dispose of all their estates, especially such as have born arms against them; then it may be required, that upon the sale, a competent proportion, of the value, be paid to the use of the State. And, no doubt, many good bargains will, by this means, be afforded to Protestant Purchasers, together with an unquestionable title, from the true owners.

4 To let them go to Mariland, is better, then that they should go into any Foreign Princes Dominions; because it will not be for the honour, nor perhaps for the safety of England, to permit another Princes Territories to be supplied with people, by any considerable number of the Natives of this Kingdome: Whereas the planting of the said Roman Catholicks in Mariland (w^{ch} hath a dependance on the Crown of England) Will conduce much to the honour and profit of this State and Nation, by enlarging the Dominions thereof, by encrease of trade and shipping, by vent of our native commodities, by importation of others, and, consequently, by improvement of customes; for they cannot subsist in Mariland, without yearly supplies of many
