On taking a review of the many important determinations of this session, we shall be led to conclude, that however long and expensive it has been, considerable benefits have accrued to the State, and that by the regulations which have been introduced; it is probable the public business will in future be conducted with infinitely more ease and expedition.

Of this nature are the establishment of the average value of lands, the modes of assessing landed and personal property and the provisions that have been made to comply with the requisitions of Congress. Some other transactions may be pointed out, which will, I am inclined to suppose, obtain the approbation of the public.—To instance—In this session, supplements were passed to the college act. from which we may look forward, to the completion of that laudable institution.—The bill for the support of the clergy was rejected by the House of Delegates.—Important regulations were made respecting commerce, by this State and Virginia.—The Chancellor's and Judges salaries were increased.—The memorial of Mr Harford, was unanimously rejected by the Senate.—Conveyances of land were aided, the Chancellor's powers were increased, and the law was considerably altered and amended.—An act was passed to regulate the inspection and exportation of tobacco.—The motion to remove the seat of government was for that time defeated.

A variety of business of a private nature, was likewise brought before the Assembly, which it would be tedious and unnecessary to particularize. The members by this time seemed extremely anxious to put a close to the session, and with that view, some hours of the night were set apart for the transaction of business, but it did not appear that much advantage was derived to the public by this expedient.

After several days had been named, the acts which had passed were signed, &c. and the assembly with the usual forms adjourned on Sunday the 12th of March.

I think it necessary to observe. that, in the remarks I have offered to the public, I have been totally uninfluenced by any party spirit, and except with regard to certificates, have not a particular interest in any subject which came before the Assembly.
