FARM AND HOUSEHOLD. Driving Working Horses.

First.—The load should be just what the horse or team can move steadily along, neither so light that they are occupying their time in going over the road with less than they can draw, nor so heavy that they must over tax their strength to draw it, or stop to take breath and to recover from the effects of too hard a strain; in short, they should do all they can do, comfortably, never much less, and never any more.

Second.—Horses will work better if they are kept well up to the bit, not sufficiently to pull on it, but just enough to feel its effect and to receive its support in case of a take step, than when allowed to become negligent and careless in their gait.

Third.—When there are two or more horses in a team, they should be so harnessed as to draw exactly alike. This requires them to be of uniform dispositions, and in equally good training; any deviation from this will cause one horse to do more, and another less, than his share of the work.

Fourth.—Working horses should never be whipped while drawing, except it is absolutely necessary, and then they should not simply be tapped, but smartly punished in a manner that will cause them to understand and recollect that their driver really means that they shall work, and work properly. First.-The load should be just what the means that they shall work, and work properly.

Fifth.—If necessary to stop to rest before going up a hill, let the halt be a little distance from the foot of the hill, that they may not get in the habit of stopping just at the foot of every hill which they encounter. When they are fully rested and prepared to go on, let them move vigorously, but do not allow then to rush at the hill; they would in such a case lose more in wind than they would gain in impetus. If possible, go moderately up every hill without stopping, recollecting that it is much harder to start a load against a hill than it is to keep it in motion after it is started. At the top of every difficult hill, either stop the team or let them walk slowly for a few rods, until they have recovered from the effects of the extra exertion.

Eighth.—The team should never be so hardly driven as to become blown (where it is possible to avoid it,) nor should they ever be allowed to become indolent, or careless in their gait. They should always be active and willing, but never impatient to do more than is clearly within their powers. - American Stock Journal.

Make the Pigs Fat.

Pigs are scarce and pork is likely to command a good price. A well-fatted pig brings at least two cents per pound more than one with bare kidneys and thin sides. Eight bushels of corn, with ordinary pigs, that have nearly attained their growth, should give us at least 100 pounds of growth. At 10 cents per pound, live weight, the present price for fat pigs in Chicago, this would give us one dollar a bushel for the corn. But this is not all. If we sell a pig not half fat, weighing say 250 pounds, we should get only 8 cents per pound, or $20. Keep this pig two months, and feed it eight bushels of corn and it should then weigh 350 pounds and bring without any advance in prices, 10 cents per pound, or $35. In this way we get $15 for 8 bushels of corn, or $1.87\frac{1}{2} per bushel.

During October, fattening pigs should be pushed forward as rapidly as possible.

pushed forward as rapidly as possible. It is poor economy to feed them on nubbins, or soft, immature corn. Better give such corn to the cattle or to mileh cows. But if ti must be fed to the fattening pigs let them at any rate have one or two meals a day of sound corn. And take pains to induce them to eat as much as they can digest.—
The chief points in fattening pigs are:—
Comfortable quarters, a constant supply of water in a separate trough, regular feeding, and undisturbed sleep. As to how long it will be profitable to continue the fattening, we know of no better test than the amou of food consumed. A two hundred pound pig that is doing well will eat at least a Agricultural Warehouse.

THE BLANCHARD CHURN.

Bushel of corn a week-and if he eats more and digests it you may be pretty sure he is growing rapidly and is paying well for his feet; but as he gets "filled up" he will be less, and so long as this is due to his being more quiet and contented, and to sleeping more, it is little or no disadvantage, but when it arrives from loss of amount to The above is the most complete CHURN and BUTTER WORKER ever mode; cannot get out of order; brings the butter quick; works and salts it without removing it from the Churn and without tone hing the buste to it. We have given this Churn as thorough tried, and prenounce it the best in use.

but when it arrises from loss of appetite or impared digestion, there is little profit in keeping him longer. A three hundred in the first profit in keeping him longer. A three hundred and fifty or four hundred pound pig, that cannot be induced to cat more than three quarts of corn meal a day, must be gain very little and had much better be killed and put into the pork barrel.

Foreing Rhubarb. Forcing Rhubarb is one of the simplest of all our forcing or forwarding operations. The roots are dug from the open ground in fall, put close together in a box or barrel, and soil sifted in to fill the interstices between the roots; they are then placed in a situation where the temperature will range from 55% to 75%, with a moderate amount of moisture. By this treatment, Rhubarb may be had from January to April. The roots may be placed wherever there is the necessary temperature; light is not necessary at all, in fact the stalks of Rhubarb are much more crisp and tender when forced without exposure to direct light; hence the roots may be placed in the furnace room of a cellar, under the staging of a greenhouse, or in an early forcing Forcing Rhubarb is one of the simplest S. ROWLAND CARSON, of a greenhouse, or in an early forcing grapery. A florist in Boston, a few years ago, sold enough Rhubarb grown under his ago, sold enough Rhubarb grown under his greenhouse stages, to pay his coal bill, dover $100, besides having all he wanted for his family use. Rhubarb is forced quite extensively by some of our market gardeners; the method pursued by them is to lift the roots from the open ground in the fall, place them as closely together as possible in such pits or frames as are used for hot-leds, but about two feet deep, sifting in soil so as to fill the spaces between the roots. On the approach of cold weather, the whole is covered over with a foot or so of dry leaves and so remains until about the first of February, when the leaves are removed and sashes when the leaves are removed and sashes placed on the frames. Sometimes this is not done until March, the sashes being then used which have been covering cabbage plants through the winter. But little ventilation is given to the frames at this cabbagase, as it is necessary to the state of the covering that the property is the same of the covering that is the same of the covering that is the property to the same of the covering the c tle ventilation is given to the frames at this cold season, as it is necessary to raise the temperature of the frame by the action of the sun's rays, so as to forward the crop.—It greatly aids the forwarding if the sashes are covered up at night by straw mats or shutters to retain the heat.

Rhubarb so forced matures about one month before it is marketable from the open ground, and averages about $10 for every 2x6 foot sash. It must be borne in mind, however, that forcing to some extent injures the roots, and for that reason it is only practised by those who have a surplus.
