FARM AND HOUSEHOLD.
Extract from Mr. Lyman's Valuedictory Address before the N. Y. Farmers' Club.
We spread our manures and our seed over too much surface. We get ten bushels of rye from two acres, when we might take it from fifty. We run over fifty acres for fifty tons of hay, when it could be cut with less labor and of better quality from twenty-five acres.
None of our acres but will bring some income, without cultivation, by a growth of wood. East of the mountains it would be wisdom to give back half the surface now cleared to forest, and concentrate all our pains and manures and seed on the remaining half.
The grand defect of all American farming is indifference to the methods by which the manure pile may be increased. East of the mountains we know that we ought to use more manure, but neglect the sources and the arts by which we are to make our lands productive. West of the mountains, a vast spread of soil naturally productive and rich has flattered the Western farmer and cut the sinews of his thrift. He has neglected manure, he has despised the fittest husbandry, he has despised the best of his own soil. He has broken their backs and tire their arms forcing over compost piles; meantime the power of his soil has fallen away from 35 to 30 bushels of wheat, from 30 to 25, from 25 to 20, from 20 to 15, in the older States of the West, and the crop is still in the down grade, and will go as low as poor old Virginia. He has piled the less fortunate who break their backs and tire their arms forcing over compost piles; mean-
away from 35 to 30 bushels of wheat,
from 30 to 25, from 25 to 20, from 20
to 15, in the older States of the West,
and the crop is still in the down grade,
and will go as low as poor old Virgin-
ia. He has piled the less fortunate
