FARM AND HOUSEHOLD.

Ladders. Sometimes a ladder is the means of saving a house, and it is important that one of more good ladder should be on hand at every house.

Proctor a straight pole of chestnut, cut, or some other wood, and place it on one side for boring the holes, which should be about a foot apart, and bored clear through with an inch auger; then when these are bored, turn half way round and line on each side, and rip apart with a hand saw—the back should be shaved off. Make the rungs of good white oak, and for a ladder of from 16 to 24 feet, the lower rung may be 30 inches long, and the upper ones 18 to 20 inches.

It is a matter of little cost, and certain one of great prudence, for every person who wishes to save his house from fire, to prepare suitable ladders and have a convenient place to keep them close at hand, so that in case of fire he can by any part of his house roof in a very few minutes, when a few buckets of water may save his property from destruction.

How I Made a Hedge. Ozone hedge makers differ pretty widely as to the best distance to put the plants in the row, and a novice in hedge making is perfectly bewildered when he reads the advice of divers men. He does not know what is really best to do, and so he makes a leap in the dark and hopes for the best.

I intended two years ago to make a hedge around my orchard, aiming to erect a barrier against thieves and a wind-break at the same time. I had no experience whatever, had never seen a hedge, and desiring to proceed aright, I ordered "Warder on Hedges," which I carefully studied, but for the life of me I could not tell but that work whether it was best to put the plants in a single row, four inches apart, or a double row, two feet apart, or a single row, six, eight, ten, fifteen, or twenty inches apart. Each plan was highly recommended, and each said to be the best. I finally settled on a single row, eight inches apart. I believe Mr. Warder himself prefers two feet apart, but a hedge made on this plan would not in twelve years turn a two hundred pound hog. The distance between the plants in the experienced hedge growers of the West—chief among whom is Prof. J. R. Turner, of Jacksonville, Ill.—is six inches, and even four inches is better than eight inches or any greater distance. In spite of all that the most careful and vigilant can do, many of the plants will die out or become so feeble that they do not keep up with their adjoining neighbors, and a "break" or "gap" in the hedge is the consequence, as not one replant in a dozen will grow and thrive sufficiently to fill up the missing place, no matter how carefully it may be replanted and tended. For this reason it may be safe to infer (and act accordingly) that close setting—say four to six inches—is the best of all plans; and then, the following fall after planting, if the plants are found to be too thick, it is far easier, and more satisfactory, to remove every other one than to depend upon replanting the following spring.

Now for my plan. Being tired with the labor of setting every plant just eight inches from the next, and holding it there perfectly straight while setting, I commenced on a back line to put them in a trench which had been made perfectly straight, regardless of exact distances, put them in carefully all the way from two to four inches, and not minding whether they grew straight or crooked. They grew just as well as any, and in the fall I thinned them to about four inches. Now this back line is the best of all my entire hedge, and I firmly believe it the best plan after all.

Method of Utilizing Bones.—The utility of ray bones is much circumscribed by the difficulty of bringing them into a fit state for use. A rough method of cracking them, or reducing them to large fragments by means of a heavy pounder or sledge, may be employed where they are intended for use in an orchard or vineyard, where they may be buried in the roots of a permanent or perennial fruit tree. It has become useful to animal crops they must be brought to a more practical shape. When coarsely broken they may be reduced by a heavy roller, or by a mangle with much less inconvenience than by sulphuric acid. To accomplish this, a rough but tight box, not over eighteen inches deep, is needed. Prorease sound, unbleached wood shavings, mix a peck of slacked lime with a peck of salted to the very best of dry bones. Pack the ashes, etc., with the bones in layers (bones first) until the box is filled. Saturate the mass with water, and add from time to time more water to preserve a constant state of moisture. In four or six weeks the bones will have become so soft softened that they will crumble to powder with a slight blow. The mass may then be mixed up and heated in an alcohol at an equal quantity of water, and thoroughly intermingled. This compost is too strong for direct application to the soil, and in using it for corn some earth needs to be mixed with it previously. If the quantity of ashes is increased the process is proportionately hastened.

SCALLOPED OYSTERS.—This makes an excellent dish to accompany the turkey or goose at a dinner, to serve at a supper party, or to help out an otherwise meager dinner. Small oysters, which cost less than large ones, and are just as well flavored, will answer as large. Butter a pudding-dish and put on a thin layer of bread crumbs or rolled crackers; put on a layer of oysters, another layer of crumbs, and so on until the dish is filled, or all the oysters have been used. The top layer should be of crumbs. In filling the dish, put bits of butter and a little pepper with each layer of oysters. A very little mace makes an excellent seasoning for this dish; a few bits with each layer—avoid using too much. The oysters in cooking usually give up enough liquor to moisten the crumbs. Bake for an hour. The dish should be handsomely browned upon top, and should be moist all through, without any running liquor.

SCRATCHES.—Careless grooming has caused my horse to be scratched with the scratcher upon the hind feet and I have not been able to hit upon any effective remedy. What shall I apply? M. G. Eric Co., N. Y. ANSWER.—When the heels are very bad a few days rest are necessary. Cleanse the feet well with castile soap, and apply a weak solution of carbolic acid and water. Take the crystallized acid and dissolve one part in twenty parts of water. With this the affected parts with this solution, and then wet a cloth in it and bind on the feet. Keep the feet bandaged when at work till healed. This remedy is always effective.—LIVE STOCK JOURNAL.
