THE SCHOOL OF LIFE.

Life is a school, in the first place, because we begin from the first to learn in it. We sometimes speak of children beginning to go to school. But we do not speak correctly. Children begin to go to school when they begin to learn, and they begin to learn as soon as they begin to open their little eyes upon life. The face of the mother is the first lesson set for a child to study. Its first impression is the smile of that fore, which in due time, awakens a that face, which in due time awakens a responsive smile upon its own face. It passes then to the study of its own hands, the furniture of the room, the inmates of the family, strangers who may happen to Messrs. Aikin & Lewis, before Justice Geo. come in and enlarge its sphere. It ex-R. Howard, which was superseded, and plores the various apartments of the home. right and wrong; that it is approved for certain actions and blamed for certain other actions; that a superior will is placed above it; that there are others in the home; brothers and sisters whose rights it must respect. These and other things the child descriptions. Western generally firm at respect. These and other things the child at once begins to learn, on entering the school of life. And these little accumulations of knwledge, as insignificant as we may deem them, are the foundation of all that a child are known in the great school. Its every day work presses upon us with the great problems of industry, of affection and home, for the springs of this industrial economy that often seem so bitter, find their supply in the secret sources of the fount, love and hope. The expense of home is an important teacher, it teaches us the great lesson of mutual sacradice.—We are to learn the duty of self-denial, of patient waiting, and how divine a thing it is to stand so intimately associated with others in the family circle that as the poet others in the family circle that as the poet

All these open up the school of life.— There is one lesson that this school of life teaches us that I cannot pass over. The

It sounds the deep places of our heart; it awakens deathless affections. It reveals to us a nature that only God and heaven can satisfy, and this religious education comes to grown all the departments of life. How poorly is that one educated to whom the great school of life brings no moral principle, no personal responsibility, hope that reaches beyond outward and temporal things.

It will be seen by this sketch of the school of life that education is not the ac-
