The shell fell in the Inpeach crop is an abundant one of a total dian camp and was picked up by one of in nearly the same latitude as the cities of increase the expenses of their owners and the Indians and exploded in his hand, failure. The heaviest crops have served to increase the expenses of their owners and bring them more in debt latterly; the middle men or "huckters," who purchase all that reaches the wharves and depots, generally reap the entire profits of the crop; the owner often finding himself, after his pickers have been paid, poorer for his great wealth of luscious fruit. Although the owners, under the prevailing system, are compelled mostly to part with their peaches at just what the middle men determine to give—which is very often less than the cost of freight and picking—yet, a basket of fair peaches can seldom be bought in the Philadelphia retail market for less than the cost of freight and picking—yet, a basket of fair peaches can seldom be bought in the Philadelphia retail market for less than a $1.50 to $2.00. The "huckster" or middle man has perhaps paid fifty centra—often twenty-five cents—at the wharf a few hours before; and with little or no risk, expense for transportation, or loss of time, he, by combination is enabled to reap absolutely all the profit there is in the peach large and the place. The place of the place he, by combination is enabled to reap absolutely all the profit there is in the peach crop. Indeed those smart middle men the course of the several skirmishes and the course of the several skirmishes and the course of the several skirmishes and the crop, for what the farmer realizes, fails in numerous instances, to pay his pears to be uncertain whether they are fails in numerous instances, to pay his pears to be uncertain whether they are have lost only two head, and they were two expenses of shipment and picking, much still in the lava beds or have made their cless the interest on his land invested, and with a reasonable remuneration for necessary labor and attention.

worse, from year to year, with no prospect and an opportunity to commit depredaof mending, without a thorough revision tions in other quarters. A dispatch from of mending, without a thorough revision of the system on which farmers conduct their business. A congress of the peach growers of New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland might, we think, devise an effectual remedy, by adopting rules under which the entire peach business should be conducted. The crop would have to be placed in the hands of their own agents in the cities who should be peach growers, and sufficiently numerous and trustworthy to control the wholesale price of the fruit, and regulate the supply to the demands of the retail market. The quantity of fruit required for the next day's market could be determined every evening and apportioned fairly through the different sections of the peach shipping districts, and by communicating by telegraph with all the principal shipping points, a glut in the market would be avoided, by helding leach the surplus above the market reof the system on which farmers conduct the front, dated April 20th, says: back the surplus above the market requirements.

A congress of peach growers, who would take their own affairs in hand, and set about remedying the evil intelligently could certainly greatly advance the interests of the peach business, and put into their own pockets, where it rightly belongs, the large profits which city middle men make out of their toil, care and capital. We know what a great amount of ignorant pig-headedness exists among farmers, but a combination of intelligent men would be able to control the freights, and by that means prevent gluts in the market when means prevent gluts in the market when the fruit season is at its hight, to the adfoot of every car per mile run) would make the fruit season is at its hight, to the advantage of every man engaged in the business. Ily having entire control of the supply and sale to stall owners in the markets, a fair profit could be realized by every peach grower, for the consumption of peaches in the munerous cities and towns within reach of the peach districts, in a few hours by rail, is almost beyond computation, and every year increasing. Other industries are regulated in a sollar manner, and through their own chosen agents: why could not our farmers as well, especially in a product confined to a comparatively small area as the peach growing is?
